It is said, sir, that a spirit of avarice and cupidity will seize the people, and that members of Congress will become so infected with the mania that they will refuse to make the necessary appropriations; and what most astonishes me is, that our experience under the act of 1836 is urged to justify this reasoning. In my judgment, never was any thing more unfounded. Look at the appropriations of the last year, amounting to about $50,000,000. When and where has this extravagance any parallel? Look at the appropriations of this year, the amount of which I have no means of ascertaining, but scarcely less profuse, as we all know, than those of the last year. Nay, more: I appeal to every gentleman here to consult his own conscience, and then to declare whether he has felt any such sordid influence on his mind, in the votes which he has recorded. And if he has not, I leave him to settle the question whether he is more pure than his fellow-citizens, and more capable of resisting temptation.

Sir, I have seen a great and commanding influence exerting itself, ever since the bill of 1836 was proposed, to defeat it. It worked in vain last year, but its power has increased in this body. It has grown determined to set the States down as narrow-minded, avaricious, and unworthy of confidence; ay, not fit to be trusted with their own. And there seems to be such a conviction of this unfitness, that the deposit banks are to be placed over them as guardians.

Now, sir, there is but one of these arguments entitled to the slightest consideration; all suggestion as to the avarice and corruption of the people is a calumny—a slander; it is an attempt to teach them to disgrace themselves. But when we are told that the powers of this Government may be diminished by this process, I will not say it does not deserve consideration. I have hitherto seen no proofs of it, and yet I confess I should not regret to see the patronage of the Executive diminished—cut down to a tithe of its present ample dimensions. It is plethoric, and I am willing to see it depleted. If, therefore, it should produce this effect only to a reasonable extent, (and I should let blood freely,) I should be far from objecting to it; indeed, the medicine is needed, for this branch of the Government wants purifying.

Here lies, whatever else may be urged, the great objection to this measure, which is felt by those in, and who hope to be in, power.

It is they who feel all this anxious solicitude about the avarice of the people, and their danger of corruption. But I cannot resist the belief that they feel much more solicitude about retaining power and patronage. No power works with more effect, or insinuates itself more certainly into the feelings, and winds itself about the hearts of men, than that of money. You have a host of deposit banks scattered throughout the country, one and all bowed down to the executive will. Connected with them is an army of stockholders, borrowers, and persons seeking special favors. The Executive is the magnet, the centre of attraction, which holds all these in their places, and in obedience. Those who have dwelt with horror upon the influence of the Bank of the United States, and its successor, will be able, by turning their eyes from that monster to this, with its multiplied heads, to understand the power and patronage which money bestows. It is the fear of losing this influence that creates this holy horror, and excites this distrust of the States. You are willing to pile up the public money in these banks till it overtops their capital, and run the risk of all danger, rather than part with the controlling influence it gives you; and this is the reason why the people cannot be trusted with their own property; why the deposit banks are better entitled to use and enjoy the earnings of the public money than the people themselves. But they well understand this reasoning; they well comprehend that you have a very studious care of their morals, but a sharper eye upon your own power and interests.

It is said there will be no surplus. Be it so; what harm will come of this law in that case? It only proposes to divide and deposit what may exist; and if none exist, there will be nothing for the law to act upon, and nothing to corrupt the people. It will be a harmless dead letter merely, for it is not permanent, as has been suggested, but provides for the deposit of such as shall be on hand the 1st day of January next. Nothing more. If the Senate resist this measure because the office-holders are in danger of losing some of their power and patronage, the responsibility must rest on those who do it. All I ask is, that the issue be fairly made up for the public decision. Let the people understand that they are considered less worthy of confidence than the office-holders and the pet banks.

After some further debate, the question was taken, and the Senate determined to adhere to its disagreement, by the following vote:

YEAS—Messrs. Benton, Brown, Buchanan, Cuthbert, Ewing of Illinois, Fulton, Grundy, Hubbard, King of Alabama, King of Georgia, Linn, Lyon, Mouton, Nicholas, Niles, Norvell, Page, Parker, Rives, Robinson, Rugles, Sevier, Strange, Tallmadge, Walker, Wall, Wright—27.

NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Calhoun, Clay, Clayton, Crittenden, Davis, Ewing of Ohio, Hendricks, Kent, Knight, McKean, Moore, Morris, Prentiss, Preston, Robbins, Southard, Spence, Swift, Tipton, Tomlinson, Webster, White—23.

The Senate, on motion of Mr. BENTON, spent some time in executive business.

When the doors were reopened, the Senate took up and acted upon some other minor business; when

Mr. HUBBARD submitted a joint resolution, providing for the appointment of a committee, to join such committee as may be appointed on the part of the House of Representatives, to wait on the President of the United States, and inform him that the two Houses, having finished the business before them, were ready to adjourn the present session of Congress. This resolution was agreed to, and sent to the House for concurrence.

THANKS TO THE PRESIDENT pro tem.

Mr. KING, of Alabama, the President pro tem., having temporarily left the chair,

Mr. DAVIS submitted the following resolution, which was unanimously adopted:

Resolved, That the thanks of the Senate be tendered to the honorable WILLIAM R. KING, President pro tem., for his late impartial and dignified services as presiding officer.

CHEROKEE MEMORIAL.

Mr. SOUTHARD moved to take up the memorial presented by him some days since, from the Cherokee Indians, for the purpose of its being printed.

Mr. KING, of Georgia, objected to the printing, on the ground of there being no object but to keep up an unnecessary excitement.

Mr. SOUTHARD warmly advocated the motion, and asked for the yeas and nays.

After some remarks from Messrs. KING of Georgia, BUCHANAN, WALKER, and WEBSTER, the question was taken, and the Senate refused to take up the memorial.

Leave was then granted to the memorialists to withdraw it.

Mr. HUBBARD, from the joint committee appointed to wait on the President, and inform him that the two Houses of Congress, having finished the business before them, were now ready to adjourn, unless he had some further communication to make, reported that they had performed the duty assigned them, and were answered by the President that he had no other official communication to make, but that he had charged him to say that it was the wish of his heart that each member of Congress might enjoy health and prosperity in this world, and happiness in the next.

On motion of Mr. WEBSTER,

The Senate then adjourned sine die.

EXTRA SESSION OF THE SENATE.

"THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES,

"To ———, Senator for the State of ———.

"By virtue of the power vested in me by the constitution, I hereby convene the Senate of the United States, to meet in the Senate chamber on the 4th day of March next, at 10 o'clock in the forenoon, to receive any communication the President of the United States may think it his duty to make.

"ANDREW JACKSON.

"DECEMBER 20, 1836."

SATURDAY, MARCH 4, 1837.

In conformity with the above-recited summons from the President of the United States, the Senate assembled in their chamber, in the city of Washington, at 10 o'clock A. M. this day.

The Senate was called to order by Mr. KING, of Alabama, the late President pro tem.

RICHARD M. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, Vice President of the United States, being present, was conducted to the Secretary's table by Mr. GRUNDY, and the oath to support the constitution of the United States having been administered to him, Mr. KING vacated the chair, and Mr. JOHNSON took his seat as President of the Senate and Vice President of the United States.

The VICE PRESIDENT, on taking the chair, addressed the Senate as follows:

Gentlemen of the Senate: In entering upon the discharge of the duties of the presiding officer of this body, the necessity of addressing its members has been very much lessened, if not superseded, by the opportunity afforded me of presenting some of my sentiments when I accepted the situation.

I cannot, however, permit the present occasion to pass without again tendering to you my grateful acknowledgments for the honor conferred upon me by your choice.

There is not, in my opinion, upon this globe, a legislative body more respectable and more exalted in character than the Senate of the United States; and there is not, perhaps, a deliberative assembly existing where the presiding officer has less difficulty in preserving order. This facility is attributable principally to two causes: the intelligence and patriotism of the members who compose the body, and that personal respect and courtesy which have always been extended from one member to another, in its deliberations. These qualities have a tendency to produce a unity of design, and a mutual confidence, in the ultimate object of all, whatever difference of opinion may exist in relation to the means of gaining the common end; and inculcate that sentiment of equality among the members, which constitutes the essential principle of our free institutions, and which will never cease to animate a body so enlightened as this. These reflections have mitigated the intense anxiety of mind, and well-founded apprehensions, arising from a consciousness of my own deficiency of qualifications to preside over this elevated body.

In the exercise of the powers conferred upon me by the constitution, it shall be my effort to pursue that course of conduct which has recommended me to the consideration of my fellow-citizens—a faithful discharge of my public duties, to the extent of my abilities, and in a manner that shall seem best calculated to give satisfaction to all. Contemplating the duties and ceremonies of this day, it might be considered improper in me to consume any more of your time by adverting to other subjects, however relevant to the new position which I now occupy. I shall, therefore, close my remarks by informing the Senate that I am now ready to proceed with the business for which we are assembled.

There were now ascertained to be present every Senator from every State in the Union, except one, (Mr. MC-KINLEY, of Alabama,) being fifty-one in number.

The new members present were—

From Indiana, OLIVER H. SMITH; from Illinois, RICHARD M. YOUNG; from Ohio, WILLIAM ALLEN; from Maine, REUEL WILLIAMS; from Connecticut, PERRY SMITH.

The oath prescribed by the constitution was then administered by the VICE PRESIDENT to the new Senators, and those Senators re-elected, except Mr. SEVIER, of Arkansas, the consideration of whose credentials of appointment by the Governor (as to filling the vacancy occasioned by the expiration of his own term) was postponed to Monday.

The Senate continued its sittings on Monday, Tuesday, Wednesday, and Thursday following, and were engaged, principally upon executive business—acting upon the nominations of the President.

On Tuesday, Mr. GRUNDY, from the Judiciary Committee, reported "that the Hon. AMBROSE H. SEVIER is entitled to his seat as a Senator from Arkansas, under the executive appointment of the 17th of January, 1837, and that he now have the oath of office accordingly administered to him." On Wednesday the report was debated, and on the question of agreeing to it the yeas and nays were as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Brown, Buchanan, Clayton, Cuthbert, Fulton, Grundy, Hubbard, Linn, Lyon, Nicholas, Niles, Norvell, Pierce, Preston, Rivers, Robinson, Ruggles, Smith of Connecticut, Tipton, Walker, Wall, White, Wright, Young—26.

YAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Black, Clay, Crittenden, Davis, Kent, King of Alabama, King of Georgia, Knight, McKean, Morris, Mouton, Prentiss, Robbins, Smith of Indiana, Southard, Swift, Webster, Williams—19.

Mr. SEVIER then appeared and took the oath of office.

The VICE PRESIDENT having retired from the chair on Tuesday, according to usage, to allow of the choice of a President pro tem. before the adjournment, the Senate proceeded to ballot for a President pro tem., when WILLIAM R. KING, of Alabama, was elected.

At the close of Thursday's sitting, a committee was appointed, on motion of Mr. WRIGHT, to announce to the President of the United States that the Senate had got through its business, and was ready to adjourn, if he had no further communication to make to them. Mr. WRIGHT and Mr. LYON were appointed a committee accordingly.

On Friday morning, at 10 o'clock, the committee reported that they had discharged the duty thus confided to them, and had received for answer that the President had no further communication to make them. And then

The Senate adjourned sine die.

MONDAY, DECEMBER 5.

At twelve o'clock the SPEAKER (HON. JAMES K. POLK, of Tennessee) took the chair, and called the House to order.

The roll of members having been called over by the Clerk, (WALTER S. FRANKLIN, Esq.,) and a quorum being found in attendance, the House proceeded to business, and appointed a committee, jointly with a committee of the Senate, to wait upon the President of the United States, and inform him of the organization of the two Houses, and their readiness to receive any communication from him.

APPOINTMENT OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. ELISHA WHITTLESEY moved the adoption of the following order:

Ordered, That the several standing committees be now appointed according to the standing rules and orders of the House. [That is, that the Speaker be authorized now to appoint them; in the event of which order, they would be agreed upon by the Speaker, and announced to the House by the reading of the journal on the opening of to-morrow's sitting.]

Mr. BOON said that it had been usual not to make the appointment until the first Thursday in the first week of the session, and that it was then customary for the House to adjourn until the following Monday.

Mr. WHITTLESEY said he hoped no gentleman would oppose the adoption of the order. He hoped, at least, that no motion would be made for a further postponement than to-morrow. It certainly had been the usage, of late years, not to appoint the committees until the close of the first week. Formerly, however, the committees had been appointed on the first day of the session, and he could see no reason why the appointment should be postponed. Why should a week be idly spent, before the House proceeded to business? It seemed to him that the business should be commenced immediately. He called the attention of the members to the position in which the House found itself at the close of the last session; and he warned them that such would again be their position, unless the business was vigorously commenced in the early part of the session. At the commencement of a new Congress (Mr. W. said) there was undoubtedly some reason why the appointment of the committees should not take place immediately; the members had to become personally acquainted with the Speaker. But no such reason existed now. He implored the members, he called upon every gentleman to aid him in transacting the business of the House; and, with that view, to second him in his endeavors for its immediate commencement. There were only a few members absent, and he hoped that, at the furthest, the House would not consent to a further adjournment than to-morrow.

Mr. BOON assured the gentleman from Ohio that he had no desire to embarrass the proceedings of the House. He was fully as anxious as any other member that the business should be commenced forthwith. But only one hundred and seventy-six members had answered to their names; and it was probable that a number of the members who had been appointed on certain committees at the last session of Congress would be deprived of having their names again placed on the same committee, or any other. The Speaker, moreover, required time to make the appointments; and for this, as well as for other reasons which were perfectly satisfactory to his own mind, he would move that the further consideration of the subject be postponed until Thursday next.

Mr. MERCER said that he concurred with the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. E. WHITTLESEY] in the views he had expressed, and that he (Mr. M.) would not repeat the arguments he had used in support of them. But he would suggest that the absence of a member should not be considered as a reason why that member should not be placed on a committee. The members not present were most probably on their journey to the city, and he saw no inconvenience resulting from an appointment made in their absence.

The SPEAKER said that, unless the House altered the rule, he could not appoint an absent member to a committee.

Mr. MERCER moved that the further consideration of the subject be postponed until to-morrow; and suggested that the House should provide that the appointment on a committee of an absent member should not operate as a disqualification to serve.

Mr. E. WHITTLESEY called for the yeas and nays on the motion of Mr. BOON to postpone the consideration of the subject until Thursday next.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and, being taken, were: Yeas 33, nays 148.

So the motion to postpone was lost.

Mr. MERCER then withdrew his motion to postpone until to-morrow, and moved to amend the motion of Mr. WHITTLESEY by adding the following words: "And that the absence of a member shall not be regarded as a disqualification for an appointment upon a committee."

Mr. A. MANN moved that the House do now adjourn.

The SPEAKER suggested that no day had been fixed for the consideration of the order.

Mr. WARDWELL then moved that the further consideration of the order be postponed until to-morrow; which motion was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. A. MANN, it was ordered that the daily hour to which the House should stand adjourned should be 12 o'clock, until otherwise ordered.

After passing the usual order for supplying the members with newspapers,

TUESDAY, DECEMBER 6.

The Hon. JOHN YOUNG, elected a member from the State of New York, to supply the vacancy occasioned by the resignation of Philo C. Fuller, appeared this day, was qualified, and took his seat.

Mr. D. J. PEARCE rose and informed the House that the joint committee appointed on yesterday to wait on the President of the United States, and inform him that the two Houses had convened, and were ready to receive such communication as he might think proper to make, had performed their duty; and that they had been directed by the President to say that, at 12 o'clock this day, he would make a communication, in writing, to both Houses.

ALTERATION OF RULES.

Mr. E. WHITTLESEY gave notice that he would, on to-morrow, submit a motion to alter the 15th rule of the House, which is now in the following terms:

"15. After six days from the commencement of a second or subsequent session of any Congress, all bills, resolutions, and reports, which originated in the House, and at the close of the next preceding session remained undetermined, shall be resumed and acted on in the same manner as if an adjournment had not taken place."

Mr. W.'s motion provides that the rule be so changed as that the House proceed to the transaction of the said business immediately.

Mr. GILLET gave notice that he would, on to-morrow, submit a motion that so much of the 106th rule as provides: "Nor shall any rule be suspended, except by a vote of at least two thirds of the members present; nor shall the order of business, as established by the rules of the House, be postponed or changed, except by a vote of at least two thirds of the members present," be repealed.

The annual message was received from the President of the United States, through ANDREW JACKSON, JR., Esq., his private secretary, and was read at the Clerk's table.—[See Appendix.]

The reading of the message having been completed, Mr. LOYALL moved that it be referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and that 15,000 copies, with the accompanying documents, be printed for the use of the members, and also 5,000 copies of the message, without the documents.

Mr. BRIGGS wished to modify this resolution by ordering that the 5,000 copies be furnished to the House within two days. He understood that this had been done on former occasions.

Mr. LOYALL assented to the modification, and the resolution, thus modified, was carried.

The SPEAKER laid before the House several communications from the heads of Departments, which were ordered to lie on the table and be printed; the committees not yet being appointed, that course being adopted instead of a reference of them.

Mr. E. WHITTLESEY then moved to proceed to the consideration of the order for the appointment of committees; but, before taking the question,

On motion of Mr. PARKS,
The House adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, DECEMBER 7.

DEATH OF MR. DICKSON.

After the reading of the journal,
Mr. CLAIBORNE, of Mississippi, addressed the House as follows:

Mr. Speaker: It is only a few years since I witnessed from that gallery the affecting honors paid to the remains of a distinguished Representative from the State of Mississippi.* Since that period, she has lost two sons,† eminent for talents, in the public service, and you are now called on to render the last homage to the memory of another. The time that has intervened since the death of my lamented colleague saves me the painful duty of being the first to communicate it to his friends, now present. He died, sir, as he had lived, through a life of extraordinary vicissitudes, with characteristic fortitude, with but one wish ungratified—a wish so natural to the human heart—that, in his dark hour of dissolution, he might be supported by his nearest and best beloved, and the cherished beings that grew up and clustered around his fireside.

Sir, let death come when it will, in what shape it may, in the battle or the shipwreck, or in the solitude of the cloister, it is appalling to human contemplation. But when it overtakes us in a distant land, and we know that our last moments of agony and infirmity are to be witnessed by stranger eyes, and are conscious that we must be carried down to an unwept grave, where no kindred dust shall mingle with ours forever, and the last hope of home and of family fades from our filmed view, oh! sir, this is death! this it is to die! Such was the destiny of my colleague, "by strangers honored and by strangers mourned." His dying message was for those broken-hearted ones, now in widowhood and orphanage—his expiring sigh a prayer for them!

Mr. Speaker, I shall pronounce no eulogy on the dead. Let his history speak it. For twenty years he preserved a high position in the public service, and died poorer than when he entered it, leaving to his children the riches of an honorable name. If it be praise to have lived beloved and die unapproached, then it is due to him.

It now only remains for us to pay the final honors to his memory—sad, because it seems like breaking the last link that binds the living to the dead; solemn, when we reflect how soon, how very soon, some friend now present may invoke the same tribute for ourselves!

I offer you, sir, the following resolution:

Resolved, That, in testimony of their respect for the memory of DAVID DICKSON, late a Representative from the State of Mississippi, the members of this House will wear crape for one month.

This resolution was unanimously agreed to.

DEATH OF GENERAL COFFEE, OF GEORGIA.

Mr. HAYNES, of Georgia, then rose and addressed the Chair as follows:

Mr. Speaker: On me has devolved the mournful duty of announcing to this House the death of one of its members, my friend and colleague, the Hon. JOHN COFFEE, of Georgia. For a considerable portion of the last session of Congress he labored under severe indisposition, which at different periods detained him from the service of the House. Although his symptoms were so mitigated before the adjournment as to enable him to resume the regular discharge of his official duties, no radical amendment had taken place, and with gradually increasing force his disease closed his existence, in the bosom of his family, in the month of September last.

In speaking of a departed friend and colleague, the language of eulogy might be excused; but to those who have been associated with General COFFEE in the labors of this House, for the last three years, such language would be unnecessary.

Suffice it to say that, in his domestic and social relations, he was eminently characterized by affectionate kindness and courtesy, and that public duties were discharged with honor to himself and fidelity to his country. As the usual mark of respect, I offer the following resolutions:

Resolved, unanimously, That this House has received with the liveliest sensibility the announcement of the death of the Hon. JOHN COFFEE, a Representative from the State of Georgia.

Resolved, unanimously, That this House tenders to the relatives of the deceased the expression of its sympathy on this mournful event; and, as a testimony of respect for the memory of the deceased, the members will wear crape on the left arm for thirty days.

These resolutions were unanimously agreed to; and then, on motion of Mr. CUSHMAN,
The House adjourned.

- THURSDAY, DECEMBER 8.

APPOINTMENT OF COMMITTEES.

After the reading of the journal, Mr. WHITTLESEY moved that the order of the House for proceeding to the appointment of committees be now taken up, with the amendment offered by Mr. MERCEN, of Virginia, "that the absence of a member be not considered as disqualifying him for appointment on any of the committees."

Mr. WHITTLESEY said he entertained a hope that this amendment would be withdrawn, though at the moment he did not see the honorable member [MR. MERCER] in his seat.

Mr. HARPER remarked that he understood from the gentleman from Virginia, that, in consequence of the time which had now elapsed, he was not solicitous with regard to his amendment.

The amendment was then disagreed to, and the appointment of the committees ordered.

Mr. EVANS moved that when this House adjourn, it adjourn to meet on Monday; which was carried.

THE MADISON PAPERS.

The following message, in writing, was received from the President of the United States, by the hands of his private secretary, ANDREW JACKSON, Jr., Esq.:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I transmit, herewith, copies of my correspondence with Mrs. Madison, produced by the resolution adopted at the last session by the Senate and House of Representatives, on the decease of her venerated husband. The occasion seems to be appropriate to present a letter from her on the subject of the publication of a work of great political interest and ability, carefully prepared by Mr. Madison's own hand, under circumstances that give it claims to be considered as little less than official.

Congress has already, at considerable expense, published, in a variety of forms, the naked journals of the revolutionary Congress, and of the conventions that formed the constitution of the United States. I am persuaded that the work of Mr. Madison, considering the author, the subject-matter of it, and the circumstances under which it was prepared—long withheld from the public as it has been by those motives of personal kindness and delicacy that gave tone to his intercourse with his fellow-men, until he and all who had been participators with him in the scenes he describes have passed away—well deserves to become the property of the nation; and cannot fail, if published and disseminated at the public charge, to confer the most important of all benefits on the present and every succeeding generation—accurate knowledge of the principles of their Government, and the circumstances under which they were recommended, and embodied in the constitution for adoption.

ANDREW JACKSON.

DECEMBER 6, 1836.

The message, having been read, was, on motion of Mr. PATTON, referred to the proposed Joint Committee on the Library, and ordered to be printed.

Several communications from heads of Departments were laid before the House by the Speaker, and ordered to lie on the table.

DEATH OF MR. KINNARD.

Mr. DAVIS, of Indiana, then rose and addressed the Chair as follows:

Mr. Speaker: Painful as the duty may be, it is mine of this morning to announce to the House the decease of another of its members.

My friend and colleague, the Hon. GEORGE L. KINNARD, died at Cincinnati on the 25th ult., after a few days of suffering much more severe than ordinarily falls to the lot of mankind in passing that dread ordeal. The immediate cause of his death is perhaps well known to this House and to the country. It was his misfortune to suffer from one of those appalling accidents which are of but too frequent recurrence upon our steamboats, by the bursting of their machinery. He, too, like one of our associates whose death was announced on yesterday, died among strangers, yet among friends. At the hospitable mansion of the Hon. Robert T. Lytle, (where he paid the great debt of nature,) he received the most unremitting attention and kindness, as also the most unwearied services of those who rank among the first in the profession of medicine; but all would not do; the omnipotent fiat had gone forth by which he was called from the service of his country to the service of his God. Had I studied by set phrase to pass a eulogy upon his character, I should find words too cold, language too inexpressive, to do justice to his virtues. It was my good fortune to be favored for many years with his acquaintance, and to share largely in his friendship. With a clear and discriminating mind, an honest heart, and an untiring industry, he had elevated himself to the highest seat in the affections of those who knew him best. In all the varied relations of life, (to which he was about to add another of a sacred and responsible character,) he sustained the most unsullied reputation, leaving to the world indubitable evidence, not only that he was a man of high attainments, but that he was emphatically one of God's noblest works—an honest man.

Mr. D. then submitted the following resolutions, which were unanimously adopted:

Resolved, That as a testimonial of respect for the memory of the Hon. GEORGE L. KINNARD, late a member of this House from the State of Indiana, the members of this body will wear crape on the left arm for thirty days.

Resolved, That the connexions and constituents of Mr. KINNARD are joined in the sincerest condolence for the loss of that inestimable man to them, to us, and to the country.

On motion of Mr. LAY,

DUTY ON FOREIGN COAL.

Among the petitions presented to-day was one by

Mr. ADAMS, from S. Brainard and eleven hundred others, citizens of Boston, praying for a repeal of the duties on foreign coal, who moved that the same be referred to the Committee on Manufactures.

Mr. PATTON thought that, inasmuch as petitions of a similar import had already been referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, it would be well that this petition, also, should take a similar reference.

Mr. ADAMS said that he considered these petitions, of which there will probably be a great number, as materially affecting the whole question of the tariff, and, consequently, the whole manufacturers of the country. He did not wish to enter into any debate on the subject at this time, but he moved that the question on the reference be taken by yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays having been ordered, Mr. LINCOLN, of Massachusetts, (who had presented a petition of similar import, from sundry citizens of that State, which had been referred to the Committee of Ways and Means,) rose, and proceeded to state that, if the reference proposed by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ADAMS] was persisted in, his (Mr. L.'s) memorial would be placed in a very awkward situation. Mr. L. was going on to examine the propriety of the respective references proposed, when

The SPEAKER said that, under the 45th rule of the House, the subject could not be debated on the same day on which the petition was presented, and that it would come up first in order of business to-morrow morning.

So the subject was postponed accordingly.

REPORT ON THE FINANCES.

On motion of Mr. CAMBRELENG, the annual report of the Secretary of the Treasury on the subject of the finances, together with the estimates for the year 1837, was referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. CHILDS offered a resolution granting the use of the hall to the American Colonization Society, on the evening of Tuesday next.

Mr. C. asked for the yeas and nays on this motion, which the House refused to order; and the question having been taken by a division, the resolution was adopted: Ayes 91, noes 59.

On motion of Mr. HARD, it was

Resolved, That two chaplains, of different denominations, be elected to serve during the present session of Congress, one by each House, who shall interchange weekly. Agreed to.

DUTIES ON FOREIGN GRAIN.

Mr. FRY submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means be instructed to inquire into the expediency of immediately abolishing the duties upon foreign grain or bread stuffs of all kinds.

Mr. REED moved to amend the resolution by striking out the Committee of Ways and Means, and inserting the Committee on Agriculture.

Mr. FRY said the question involved in the resolution was a plain matter of fact; and that, though he had no great solicitude as to the reference, he thought the one proposed by himself was the most appropriate.

Mr. REED thought that, as the question was one which bore greatly on the interests of the agricultural community, he thought it would be best to refer it to the committee having the special care of those interests.

The question on the amendment was then taken and carried: Ayes 87, noes 67. So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. REED observed that there existed no manner of necessity that this resolution should be referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, since every body is well aware that the revenue is sufficient, and far from requiring expedients or inquiries relating to an increase of it. He also deemed it to be a desirable thing that importations from all countries should be made as free as possible, and even without duty. But, (Mr. R. observed,) representing as this House did the interests of the whole country, we were bound to examine into the subject. He was therefore of opinion that the whole question should be referred to the Committee on Agriculture, as being the most appropriate for its consideration, and because the whole agricultural interests of the country were concerned in this question. It is true (observed the honorable member) that this is a year, it may be almost said, of famine, such as has not been known for twenty years; but, notwithstanding, it must not be lost sight of that the most important interests were in direct opposition to this proposition. He concluded by proposing, as an amendment, that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Agriculture.

A division took place, when there appeared for the amendment 87, against it 58. So the amendment was carried.

Mr. J. Q. ADAMS proposed, as an amendment, to insert the words "also foreign coals, salt, and iron." "Sugar" was also proposed to be inserted, at the suggestion of a member.

A debate was about to spring up on this question, when a motion was made to postpone the further consideration of the subject to Monday next; which motion was carried.

BOUNTY LANDS.

Mr. GILLET moved the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Public Lands inquire into the expediency of so altering the laws relating to bounty lands as to allow those entitled to them to locate on any public lands subject to entry at private sale, or to receive land scrip in lieu of bounty land.

Mr. GILLET said he would explain the object of his resolution. It was within the recollection of most of the members present, that the soldiers of the last war were promised bounty lands. The act which contained this promise provided that public lands should be surveyed in Michigan, Illinois, Missouri, and Arkansas, if he remembered rightly. The survey in Michigan was never made, and the lands set apart in Illinois and Missouri were long since exhausted. Consequently, those who have not received their bounty lands are compelled to locate them in Arkansas. The lands there, he presumed, were good and valuable, but they were at too great a distance from the Northern soldiers to be valuable to them. They can neither go there to settle on them, nor can they readily sell them. If they keep them, it is difficult for the owner to pay taxes at such a distant point, with which Northern people have little or no communication. By the very words of the promise, the soldier has a right to lands at the North, where they are the most valuable to them. This will work no injury to the United States, but may greatly benefit the war-worn soldier, who may desire to settle upon or sell his lands. He conceived, with his friend from Ohio, [Mr. VINTON,] that the issuing scrip would be highly advantageous and convenient to the soldier, and prejudicial to no one.

The resolution was agreed to.

THE DISTRIBUTION SURPLUS.

Mr. MERCER moved the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means be instructed to report a bill to amend the 13th section of the act of the last session of Congress, entitled "An act to regulate the deposits of the public money," by releasing the several States who may receive any part of the surplus revenue of the United States, in pursuance of that act, from any obligation to return the same.

The resolution having been read,

Mr. MERCER, after a few observations upon the object of this proposition, moved to postpone the consideration of the resolution till Wednesday week next, and make it the special order of the day for that day.

Mr. DUNLAP remarked: Mr. Speaker: I am opposed to the gentleman's resolution being made the special order of this House. The resolution involves a very important question, to wit, the power of Congress to distribute the surplus revenue. This important constitutional question was avoided at the last session, and now it is intended to be brought up, to the exclusion of all other business. The States have the money, and may do what they please with it, and I wish the discussion of this subject to be postponed until a long session of Congress. This will be a very short session, and should be a business session. The Tennessee land bill, in which my constituents are immediately interested, has heretofore been postponed for the want of time, so much having been spent in the discussion of important political questions. I would be doing injustice to the interests of my constituents, if I did agree that this important question should be taken up, to the exclusion of other business. Sir, this question alone would occupy weeks in its discussion, and other measures must be made to give way to it, when no legislative action can be had on it this session. I am opposed to all unnecessary discussion at this session; and I desire that the business of the American people should be attended to. I therefore move that the resolution be laid on the table.

Mr. MERCER asked for the yeas and nays on the question of laying his resolution on the table; which were ordered; and being taken without debate, (the rules not admitting debate on a motion to lay any proposition on the table,) stood as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. John Q. Adams, Anthony, Ash, Barton, Beale, Beaumont, Black, Boon, Borden, Bouldin, Bovee, Briggs, Brown, Cambreleng, Campbell, Carr, Chaney, Chapman, Chapin, John F. H. Claiborne, Cleveland, Coles, Craig, Cushman, Davis, Doubleday, Dromgoole, Dunlap, Efner, Fairfield, Fowler, Fry, Fuller, Galbraith, J. Garland, Gillet, Glascock, Granger, Grantland, Grayson, Grennell, Griffin, Haley, Joseph Hall, Hamer, Albert G. Harrison, Hawkins, Haynes, Henderson, Hiestor, Hoar, Holt, Hopkins, Hubley, Huntington, Huntsman, Ingham, Jabez Jackson, Jarvis, Joseph Johnson, Cave Johnson, John W. Jones, Benjamin Jones, Kilgore, Klingensmith, Lansing, Laporte, Lawler, Lawrence, Gideon Lee, Joshua Lee, Thomas Lee, Leonard, Lewis, Lincoln, Logan, Loyall, Lucas, Lyon, Abijah Mann, Job Mann, Martin, William Mason, Moses Mason, McKay, McKim, McLene, Morgan, Muhlenberg, Owens, Page, Parker, Parks, Patterson, Patton, Franklin Pierce, Dutee J. Pearce, Phelps, Phillips, Pickens, Pinckney, John Reynolds, Joseph Reynolds, Ripley, Robertson, Russell, Schenck, Seymour, Shields, Shinn, Sickles, Smith, Taylor, Thomas, J. Thomson, Toucey, Turrill, Vanderpoel, Wagener, Ward, Wardwell, Webster, Weeks, Elisha Whittlesey, Thomas T. Whittlesey, Yell—126.

NAYS—Messrs. Chilton Allan, Heman Allen, Bailey, Bell, Bond, Buchanan, Bunch, John Calhoun, William B. Calhoun, Carter, Casey, George Chambers, John Chambers, Childs, Nath. H. Claiborne, Clark, Connor, Corwin, Crane, Darlington, Deberry, Denny, Evans, Everett, French, Rice Garland, Graham, Graves, Highland Hall, Hannegan, Hardin, Harlan, Harper, Hawes, Hazeltine, Howell, Ingersoll, Janes, Jenifer, Henry Johnson, Lane, Luke Lea, Love, S. Mason, Maury, McCarty, McComas, McKennan, Mercer, Montgomery, J. A. Pearce, Pearson, Pettigrew, Peyton, Potts, Reed, Rogers, W. B. Shepard, A. H. Shepperd, Slade, Sloane, Standefer, Storer, Sutherland, Taliaferro, Turner, Underwood, Vinton, Washington, White, L. Williams, S. Williams, Wise—73.

So the resolution was ordered to lie on the table.

The presentation of resolutions was continued, in the order of States, till 3 o'clock; when

THE PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE.

On motion of Mr. LOYALL, the House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the state of the

DEC. 13, 1836.]

The President's Message.

[U. OF R.]

Union, (Mr. ADAMS in the chair,) on the annual message of the President of the United States.

Mr. LOYALL moved that the reading of the message be dispensed with, which was agreed to; and thereupon Mr. L. offered a series of resolutions, referring the various parts of the message to the appropriate committees.

On motion of Mr. LOYALL, it was agreed that the resolutions should be taken up separately. The first resolution was as follows:

1. Resolved, That so much of the President's message as relates to the political relations of the United States with foreign nations be referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

The resolution was adopted.

The second resolution, in the following terms, was adopted:

2. Resolved, That so much of the said message as relates to the commerce of the United States with foreign nations and their dependencies be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The third resolution, in the following terms, was agreed to:

3. Resolved, That so much of the said message as relates to the finances, and every thing connected therewith; the safe keeping of the public moneys, and every thing connected therewith; the Bank of the United States, including the stock of the United States in that institution, be referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

The fourth, fifth, and sixth resolutions were then severally agreed to nem. con.

4. Resolved, That so much of the said message as relates to the public lands, and all things connected therewith, be referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

5. Resolved, That so much of said message as relates to the report of the Secretary of War, and the public interests intrusted to the War Department, except so much thereof as relates to Indian affairs, be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

6. Resolved, That so much of the said message as relates to the militia of the United States be referred to the Committee on the Militia.

On the reading of the seventh resolution, viz:

7. Resolved, That so much of said message as relates to the Indian tribes, and every thing connected therewith, be referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs—

Mr. LEWIS moved that the words of the resolution "and all connected therewith" be stricken out, and the words "connected with the breaking out of hostilities in Alabama and Georgia," and that the subject be referred to a select committee.

Mr. LEWIS, in support of his amendment, said that his reasons for proposing the reference of this subject to a select committee were founded on the following passage of the President's message:

"On the unexpected breaking out of hostilities in Florida, Alabama, and Georgia, it became necessary, in some cases, to take the property of individuals for public use. Provision should be made, by law, for indemnifying the owners; and I would also respectfully suggest whether some provision may not be made, consistently with the principles of our Government, for the relief of the sufferers by Indian depredations, or by the operations of our own troops."

He (Mr. L.) did not desire to refer this subject to a special committee out of any disrespect to the Committee of Claims, or that of Indian Affairs; such was not his motive. It was evident, from the paragraph of the message which he had read, that the President saw a difference in principle between the cases of suffering and depredation in the late war in the Creek country, and between former cases of Indian depredations. Had this not been his view of the case, he certainly would not have recommended special relief to be extended. Another reason which appeared to him (Mr. L.) to render it expedient to refer these claims to a special committee was the fact that so great was their number likely to be, that it would certainly throw upon the two committees to which the resolution proposed to refer them a mass of business such as they could not conveniently dispose of. It was also his desire, both from respect to the President and to his own constituents, to obtain a direct and distinct decision upon these claims, as being peculiarly different in their principle from all the other topics belonging to the sphere of the Indian department.

Mr. BELL suggested an amendment to Mr. LEWIS's amendment; which Mr. LEWIS expressed himself willing to accept.

Mr. GLASCOCK supported the amendment, on the ground that it would not be in the power of a standing committee to do justice to the multiplicity of petitions which would come before them; he therefore hoped the amendment would be concurred in by the House.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, said he could see no difference whatever between these or other claims, arising out of Indian depredations at any former period. If any familiarity with such kind of claims, if any experience on such topics, was to be found anywhere, he was certain that it was to be found in the Committees of Claims and on Indian Affairs; he was therefore at a loss to conceive why this subject should be taken out of their hands, and placed with a select committee. He concluded by moving to amend the amendment by striking out the words "select committee," and inserting "the Committee of Claims."

Mr. LEWIS, in reply, observed that the honorable member professed not to observe any difference between these and former claims under Indian depredations; it was evident, however, that the President contemplated them under a peculiar aspect, or else he would not have made a special mention of them; this was with him sufficient reason to warrant the appointment of a select committee.

The CHAIR suggested that the question before the House was upon the adoption of the original resolution. The resolution was then read by the Clerk, and afterwards the proposed amendment of Mr. LEWIS.

Mr. GLASCOCK proposed a slight modification to the amendment, which the honorable mover accepted.

The question on the original resolution was then put by the Chair, and it was agreed to; after which,

Mr. LEWIS's amendment, as modified by Messrs. BELL and GLASCOCK, was put.

Mr. E. WHITTLESEY spoke in opposition to the reference to a select committee. He contended that there existed no special difference in principle between these and other claims arising from similar causes. He deprecated the adoption of new principles of proceeding, upon the arising of new claims the same in principle with others. The Committee of Claims (observed Mr. W.) brought forward a bill, which passed in April of the year 1816, in reference to Indian depredations of all kinds, and to all other sufferings incurred in cases of war, whether those sufferings originated from the enemy or from the necessary requisitions of our own troops; there can, therefore, be no necessity (said Mr. W.) for a select committee in the present case, as no new principles ought to be established for the settlement of such claims, nor ought the principles now established to be changed or enlarged.

Mr. GLASCOCK said he concurred in the general views expressed by the member from Ohio, [Mr. WHITTLESEY,] but it occurred to him (Mr. G.) that the difficulty which was anticipated by referring this subject to a select committee would not occur. If that committee, in adjudicating the cases which came before them, deviates from those original rules and well-settled principles which had heretofore governed such cases, the House, whose province it was to supervise the reports, might reject or approve them, as seemed best. The great object to be attained by the reference to a select committee was, to expedite the action of the House; and he believed that the many claims which would be presented would throw an obstacle in the way of the Committee of Claims or the Committee on Indian Affairs giving the proper consideration to the subject. A select committee might give its whole attention to the subject, and select for the consideration of the House such cases as were entitled to its credence. He did not believe that a select committee would violate the general rules heretofore established, and yet there might be extreme cases which those general rules would not reach. He hoped the Committee of Claims would consent to the reference to a select committee.

H. OF R.]

The President's Message.

Mr. D. J. PEARCE said that the House had yet to learn that the Committee of Claims was either unable or unwilling to discharge any duties which might be assigned to them. Was there any sufficient reason to change the direction of the reference? What was the direction given to analogous cases, growing out of the war with Great Britain? If a man's horse was lost, did he go to a select committee? If the military trampled down a man's field of corn, was it necessary to go to a select committee? No. The usual course had been to refer such subjects to the Committee of Claims; but, independent of them, there were other considerations which rendered the usual reference necessary. The Committee of Claims had rules upon which they had been accustomed to act, the operations of which had been tested, and decisions made on those rules had been passed on by the House. But what would the House think of the new rules of the select committee? Would the House give the same weight to what was done that it would to the proceedings of the Committee of Claims? If, then, the House was anxious for speedy action and prompt decision, he should suppose that the usual course was preferable to a novel one. He had heard no reason why the usual course should be departed from. Did the gentleman who came from that section of the country in which the persons making these claims resided expect that the claims should be passed on differently from others? If not, why so anxious to change the course? Are they apprehensive that less than justice will be done to them? Did they want more than justice? He thought not; and what had been done before in similar cases would, he presumed, be satisfactory now.

Mr. LEWIS said it did not appear that the chairmen of the Committee of Claims or of the Committee on Indian Affairs had any objection to the proposed reference to a select committee. The only object aimed at by himself was to secure a thorough examination to the claims which might be brought up. The President of the United States had recommended an indemnity. According to the general rule, losses growing out of a war were not subjects of indemnity. If there were reasons of a special character in the present instance, which rendered such indemnity proper, he wished to have them investigated and reported on by a select committee, who would present them to the House in proper form; and if the House assented to the truth of the conclusions given, they would act accordingly. He wanted no exemption from the rules proper for the government of such a committee. He wished only to see a full statement of the reasons why this indemnity should be granted.

The question on striking out the words "select committee," and inserting "Committee of Claims," was taken, and carried; and the resolution, as amended, was adopted.

8. Resolved, That so much of the said message as relates to the report of the Secretary of the Navy, and the public interests intrusted to the Navy Department, be referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

The resolution on referring that part of the message relating to an amendment of the constitution was then taken up.

Mr. UNDERWOOD moved to strike out all after the word "Resolved," and insert the following: "That so much of the President's message as relates to an amendment of the constitution, together with all propositions and resolutions submitted at the last and present sessions of Congress, proposing an amendment of the constitution, be referred to a select committee, to be composed of ——— members.

Mr. LINCOLN inquired if such an amendment was in order. The House had gone into Committee of the Whole on the President's message only; and he submitted whether other matter, not embraced in the message, could be then considered and referred.

The CHAIR decided the amendment to be in order, on the ground of the identity of the subject.

The amendment was agreed to by a vote of 93 to 51, and the resolution, as amended, was also agreed to, and the committee ordered to consist of nine members.

The next resolution was as follows:

9. Resolved, That so much of the said message as relates to the report of the Postmaster General, the condition and operations of the Post Office Department, and every thing connected therewith, be referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. CARTER offered a resolution referring to a select committee so much of the President's message as related to the compensation of the Tennessee volunteers who had been called out from that State, but who had not been mustered into the public service.

Mr. BELL thought that the House would agree as to the propriety of the investigation proposed, and hoped that the resolution would be adopted. If there was any objection to a select committee, he hoped the subject would be referred to one of the standing committees.

Mr. D. J. PEARCE moved to strike out the words "select committee," and insert "Committee on Military Affairs."

Mr. CARTER accepted the modification.

Mr. C. JOHNSON moved the reference to the Committee of Claims.

Mr. CARTER said his only object in asking for a select committee was despatch. The volunteers were men only in very moderate circumstances; and unless some provision was made for them at the present session of Congress, it would be of little avail to make it at all. They had appeared at the rendezvous, under the belief that they were called out for twelve months' service; but when they got there, the officers refused to muster them, and they received nothing, either for expenses or otherwise, and they returned home as well as they could. The men were entitled to compensation, and the subject should be acted on at the present session.

It was well known that all the troops who volunteered in Tennessee had not been treated as kindly by the Government as their promptitude and patriotism absolutely demanded; and if the present session of Congress was allowed to pass away without some provision being made, it was not to be expected that they would come forward so promptly at a future time to answer the call of the Government. A damp would be thrown upon their patriotism. He was himself acquainted with a large portion of these volunteers, who were poor men, engaged in the pursuits of agriculture, and supporting their families by such means; they had sold out their crops, believing that they were certain of employ for twelve months to come, but were rejected, and thus deprived of the means of life. The relief, to be available, ought to be immediate, and he hoped the committee would agree to the reference.

The question was then taken on the motion of Mr. C. JOHNSON to refer the subject to the Committee of Claims, and was agreed to: Ayes 97, noes not counted. And the resolution, as amended, was adopted.

EXECUTIVE ADMINISTRATION.

Mr. WISE rose and offered the following resolution:
Resolved, That so much of the President's message as relates to the condition of the various executive departments, the ability and integrity with which they have been conducted, the vigilant and faithful discharge of the public business in all of them, and the causes of complaint, from any quarter, at the manner in which they have fulfilled the objects of their creation, be referred to a select committee, to consist of nine members, with power to send for persons and papers, and with instructions to inquire into the condition of the various executive departments, the ability and integrity with which they have been conducted, into the manner in which the public business has been discharged in all of them, and into all causes of complaint, from any quarter, at the manner in which said Departments, or their business or offices, or any of their officers or agents, of every description whatever, directly or indirectly connected with them in any manner, officially or unofficially, in duties pertaining to the public interest, have fulfilled or failed to accomplish the objects of their creation, or have violated their duties, or have injured or impaired the public service and interest; and that said committee, in its inquiries, may refer to such periods of time as to them may seem expedient and proper.

Mr. WISE then addressed the House as follows:

Mr. Chairman: In submitting the resolution of reference which I have sent to the Chair, I deem it my duty to offer some reflections to the House and to the country.

Sir, this paper is the last annual message of Andrew Jackson. The contemplation of it as such is deeply affecting to the sincere lover of him, and solemnly mournful to the honest lover of his country.

What should the last annual message of Andrew Jackson have been? Who is he, what has he been? The answer to this question ought to determine what this last act of its kind of his should have been.

A man of humble but respectable origin, he was born in the times of his country's travail for independence. His precocious spirit of resistance to oppression marked his infant body with the scars of the Revolution. After the times which tried men's souls had passed away; after the blessings of freedom had been secured by all the muniments of the institutions of our fathers, the fruits of peace, and virtue, and wisdom, and jealous patriotism; after varied and chequered scenes of private and public life, under a destiny adverse only so far as it was full of dangers, in games not olympic, in contests not heroic, we find him in the midst of his country's second troubles a citizen soldier, a major general of the army of the republic.

He "was ambitious of fame; and as long as mankind shall continue to bestow more liberal applause on their destroyers than on their benefactors, the thirst of military glory will ever be the vice of the most exalted characters." A bold, energetic, and dauntless commander, he carried conquest, in spite of all dangers and difficulties, into the wilderness of the savage tribes of the Southern frontier; was the daring but successful and justified invader of a neutral territory, and finally "filled the measure of his country's glory" in defence of Orleans, where he assumed to be the arbiter of martial law, the judge advocate of men's allegiance—where he conquered the conquerors of Napoleon—where he professed and practised submission to the civil authority, and where he acquired the title of Hero. And there was created, I will say, "a dear-bought debt of gratitude" from his country.

"Hail, second Saviour!" was shouted from the lips of every grateful heart, and echoed from every hill and valley; his name was emblazoned high on the rolls of imperishable military fame, and peace was quick to hallow his victory. With peace his warlike occupations were gone, but civil honors were showered and thickened around him. From the camp he rose to a seat in the Senate chamber—for then the Senate chamber was higher than the camp. He bore, or seemed to bear, his honors patiently; but all that had been done or could be done, it seemed, was not enough for him, in the estimation of a generous people. He was nominated for the first place on earth—the presidency of these united, sovereign, and independent States of America; for then these States were united, sovereign, and independent. Civilians and statesmen, of proudest names and stations, were his competitors, but he was the people's candidate, against men in office, against the powers that were, against their intrigues, their patronage, and their causes; and in consideration thereof, and of his just appellation of Hero, he was most popular and strongest in the plurality of votes. He was defeated—defeated here, in this hall, in the House of Representatives, by men such as we are—and what we, the representatives of the people, are, I will not name—by means I will not describe. It is sufficient to say that the manner of his defeat was not only enough to insure his subsequent triumph, but to rivet him immoveably, right or wrong, in the hearts of his countrymen forever. He became the champion of popular rights and the elective franchise, against office-holders and office-seekers—the favorite pet of the people, who was to scourge bribery and corruption, whose name was to be terror to all evil-doers, whose policy was to be retrenchment and reform, by whom the independence of Congress of executive patronage was to be maintained, by whom that patronage was to be curtailed to harmlessness, and in whom "the line of safe precedents" was to be broken and destroyed. He was swept and rushed along on the roaring tide of an overwhelming popularity high up into office, on the second flood, and that popularity has never deserted him—no fickleness in it, it has never retired for a moment; notwithstanding strong winds which have blown from every point of the compass, and opposing currents in every direction, it has continued to swell and swell, until it has become a flood—I will not say which threatens the dry land. He came into power professing and proclaiming the most severe, ay, stoical democratic principles; the people confided in him, were bound to him the closer, and have never wavered yet in their confidence—I will not say, though he has tried it to the uttermost. Unfortunately for him, when he was crowned with the reward of his military services, and was inducted into office, he not only found "competitors to be removed, enemies to be punished," but he was beset by friends from whom he should have put up prayers to be saved. I will not say that he was lacking in those magnanimous qualifications of a truly great man, which alone could rid him and guard him from these misfortunes—for man, poor feeble man, is weak under the most ordinary temptations, and his virtue must be strong who presides in a palace—but misfortunes they were.

So it was, he was buoyed up in the affections of the sovereign people. Has he done wrong? He was popular. Has he done worse than wrong? He was popular, and he was the President who could do no wrong, in whom popularity was joined with power and patronage. Has ruthless proscription for opinion's sake turned faithful public servants out of their employment, and snatched from the mouths of their families their bread? We are told the President ordered the removals, and the people had sanctioned proscription! Has favoritism filled the vacancies which proscription has made with the servile tools of party, to do the bidding of power? We are told that the President had need of his own friends, and that the people have sanctioned the maxim, "that to the victors belong the spoils!" Have the highest and richest offices, worth more than half of a million, been bestowed as rewards upon members of Congress, and has "corruption become the order of the day?" We are told that the President was the best judge of the selection of high functionaries, and that the people have sanctioned the "order of the day!" As "till the reign of Severus, the virtue and even the good sense of the Emperors had been distinguished by their zeal or affected reverence for the Roman Senate, and by a tender regard to the nice frame of civil policy instituted by Augustus," so had the virtue and even the good sense of preceding Presidents, till the reign of Andrew Jackson, been distinguished by their zeal and reverence for the American Senate, and by a tender regard for the nice frame of civil policy instituted by the fathers of our republic! Had "his youth," like that of Severus, "been trained in the implicit obedience of camps, and his riper years spent in the despotism of military command! could not his haughty and inflexible spirit discover, or would he not acknowledge, the advantage of preserving an intermediate power, however imaginary, between the Emperor and the army?" As in the reign of Severus, was "the Senate filled with polished and eloquent slaves from the eastern (and I may add southern) provinces, who justified personal flattery by speculative principles of servitude?" Have the lawyers of his reign, whom I will not call Papinians or Pauluses, or Ulpian, "concurred in teaching that the imperial authority was held not by the delegated commission, but by the irrevocable resignation of the Senate? and that the Emperor might destroy vested rights and the in corporations of law by his sic volo?" We are told that the aristocratic Senate had dared to offend the majesty of the President, and that the people have sanctioned the word "expunge!" Has the independence of Congress been totally destroyed by corrupt bribes and the power of appointing members to office? We are told that the representatives of the people are selected to do the will of the President, and that the people have sanctioned the creed that there can be no treason to the country so long as there is fidelity to "the party." Has the President "assumed the responsibility," seized the custody and the control of the public money, in defiance of all law and precedent, and placed them in the hands of a traitor and a perjured knave? We are told that the monster bank was his enemy, and that the people have sanctioned the "union of the purse and sword." Has he assumed to himself judicial powers, and the prerogative to administer the laws and the constitution according to his own interpretation and his own irresponsible will? We are told that the President's conscience alone is concerned in their execution, and that the people have sanctioned in him the power of imperial magistrate. As imperial magistrate, has he "assumed the conduct and style of sovereign and conqueror, and exercised, without disguise, the whole legislative as well as executive power?" We are told that the President is "the Government," and that the people have sanctioned the pretension that all offices and their powers are his! Have the expenditures of his administration increased and grown enormously beyond all example, to thirty-eight millions from fifteen millions, without a cent of public debt to be paid? We are told that the President is the best judge of the wants of the country, and that the people have sanctioned wasteful and profligate extravagance! Have thousands and hundreds of thousands been expended on east rooms, and gravel walks, and all the regalia of a palace in fact, for a republican officer in form? We are told that the President's court should be as splendid as any King's, and that the people have sanctioned royalty! Has the patronage of the Federal Government been tremendously increased, and exerted in conflict with the freedom of elections? We are told that the reign of the President should be perpetuated, and that the people have sanctioned the interference of office-holders with the elective franchise! Has the currency of the country been totally deranged, and is there danger of a universal crash in trade and finance? We are told that the President's golden experiment must be fully tested to our hearts' content, and that the people have sanctioned the "inverted pyramid" of local bank paper rags, which threatens to totter over our heads! Has "the fine theory of a republic insensibly vanished, and made way for the more natural and substantial feelings of a monarchy?" We are told that the President may be a king by the will of the people, and that the people have already consented to the change! Has the President been "freed from the restraint of civil laws, can he command by his arbitrary will the lives and fortunes of his subjects, and," finally, "has he disposed of the empire, as of his private patrimony," by nominating and electing his successor? We are told that the President was entitled to his right of election as well as other men, and that the people have sanctioned and submitted to his dictation!

Sir, let me not be misunderstood. Let no one infer that I am indulging in any tirade against the President, or that I am venting any spleen whatever. No, sir; no. Far, far be it from me now, now when it is too late, if ever it was right and proper, to indulge in stronger invective against a Chief Magistrate than truth and patriotism required. He of whom I speak is, I deeply regret, now lying on the couch of human suffering, the last, I fear, from what I am told, of his sufferings in this world of sorrow. I too have served him with more than half the zeal I ever served a more omnipotent master. He will, if he lives, soon retire from the palace of power, and resign all the pomp and circumstance of state and station into other hands, which are to reign after him. God grant, sir, that his retirement may be that peaceful and calm and blessed retirement from the harassing cares of office, which belongs to wisdom, virtue, and the consciousness of being a public benefactor--such as was illustrated in the examples of a Washington and a Madison. My prayer fervently is, that he may yet live long at his beloved Hermitage, in the holy retreat of his own private sanctuary, and spend the decline of his days in solemn reflections upon the scenes and events of a long life, most actively spent in deeds big with the fate of a country he has defended, and of its institutions "hallowed by the wisdom of sages, and consecrated by the blood of heroes." May he live long to witness the effects of his errors, if errors he has committed, to acknowledge and repent of them; and in like manner to enjoy the blessings of his administration, if of any blessings it has been fruitful. No, sir; my meaning is not now to condemn the President, but to defend the people. This is the sole object of the questions I have put. I do not mean to accuse the President of all these enormities against civil liberty, of which I have asked--is he guilty? Nor do I admit, if he is guilty of them, that the people have sanctioned all or any which I have enumerated. But, sir, I merely state the fact, that the party who claim to hold him in keeping, and to hold on to his power after him, claim and tell us that the people have yielded every thing worth preserving, and have sanctioned all these enormities, and more, and worse. What their object may be in admitting these encroachments, and in claiming that the people have sanctioned and approved them, I know not, unless they mean hereafter to rely upon most "unsafe precedents!" The fact is alarmingly so, that these claims are now set up, going so far as to asperse the people whom they affect so much to reverence with approving and sanctioning proscription, corruption, arbitrary power, the destruction of the checks and balances of the Government, profligate extravagance in its administration, executive dictation, royalty itself, and a caucus succession in an elective monarchy? In advance, I warn them that I now deny the fact that the people have sanctioned or approved of any such unpardonable sins against them or their only bulwarks of safety. If this people have yielded already what "the party" claim, they would have yielded all for which their fathers fought; and those fathers would rise, if the mighty dead could rise, from their very graves to reproach their debased degeneracy, and their cruel injustice alike to them and all posterity.

I have done no wrong to Jackson, then, as all candid minds will bear me witness; I have given him credit for "every captive he has brought to Rome." At the same time, I do not mean to say he has not committed many grievous errors. For many of them I can well account, though I cannot pardon. We are taught in history that "suspicious princes often promote the last of mankind, from a vain persuasion that those who have no dependence, except on their favor, will have no attachment, except to the person of their benefactor." Thus were the Perennises and Cleanders prompted by a Commodus; and such ministers were well qualified to drive from the esteem of such a prince the "faithful counsellors to whom a Marcus had recommended his son." The one "a servile and ambitious minister, who had obtained his post by the murder of his predecessor, but who possessed a considerable share of vigor and ability;" the other "was a Phrygian by birth, of a nation over whose stubborn but servile temper blows only could prevail. He had been sent from his native country to Rome in the capacity of a slave. As a slave he entered the imperial palace, rendered himself useful to his master's passions, and rapidly ascended to the most exalted station which a subject could enjoy. His influence over the mind of Commodus was much greater than that of his predecessor. Avarice was the reigning passion of his soul, and the great principle of his administration. The rank of consul, of patrician, of senator, was exposed to public sale. In the lucrative provincial employments the minister shared with the governor the spoils of the people. The execution of the laws was venal and arbitrary."

Is it astonishing that, with ministers like those of Commodus, tempted as they were by the public money in deposit, and by the vast public domain of this nation, stretching over rivers and lakes, and prairies of unbounded extent and inexhaustible fertility, Jackson was duped, and the public deposits were removed within reach of Perennis and Cleander? Again, sir, an incident in the history of this same Emperor, very similar to the one in the history of our own President, accounts for his hostility to the Roman Senate: "One evening, as the Emperor was returning to the palace through a dark and narrow portico in the amphitheatre, an assassin, who waited his passage, rushed upon him with a drawn sword, loudly exclaiming, 'The Senate sends you this.' The conspiracy was proved to have been formed not in the Senate, but within the walls of the palace." But "the words of the assassin sunk deep into the mind of Commodus, and left an indelible impression of fear and hatred against the whole body of the Senate. The Delators, a race of men discouraged, and almost extinguished under the former reigns, again became formidable as soon as they discovered that the Emperor was desirous of finding disaffection and treason in the Senate." Sir, we all know that in the snapping of a percussion cap the President heard distinctly the words, "The Senate sends you this"—that that detestable race of men called Delators were ready to swear that the conspiracy was formed in the Senate; and, if there was not a better reason, perhaps to the act of a madman now confined in prison might be ascribed the President's past hostility to the Senate. But there is a better reason. "By declaring themselves the protectors of the people, Marius and Cæsar subverted the constitution of their country." And, perhaps, in the histories of Marius and Cæsar, our modern Cleanders learned that an "humble and disarmed" Senate is always "found a tractable and useful instrument of dominion."

In a certain event, if the election of President had failed in this House, an "humbled and disarmed Senate" might have been found—a "tractable and useful instrument," indeed, to elect an Elagabalus, under whom another Hierocles might have enjoyed the honor of being "empress, husband;" and under whom "a dancer might have been made præfect of the city, a charioteer præfect of the watch, a barber præfect of the provisions," and all "recommended as fit officers—enormitate membrorum." Sir, I might enumerate numberless such excuses for numberless such errors of the President, or rather of the President's ministers. But enough has been said; and I mean not to condemn or accuse him, I repeat, but to defend the people whom "the party" accuse and condemn.

If it be true, as we are told, and I do not say it is not true, that the President has made and unmade men in office, has proscribed the faithful, has corrupted the pure, has humbled and disarmed the Senate, has made the House of Representatives servile and dependent, has seized and squandered the public money, has deranged the currency and endangered every man's estate, has controlled elections, has assumed royal prerogatives, made himself a king and a king's successor; and if it be also true, which I utterly deny, that the people have sanctioned all this exercise of absolute power, I ask, gentlemen of all parties, those even who claim to be the exclusive keepers of the king's conscience, if this does not prove one virtue—the virtue of constancy, at least, in the people? Have they not been constant and confiding beyond measure in their attachment to him? Has their fault not been in too much confidence and constancy?

If what they say be true, and it is a main argument with them, that "the voice of the people is the voice of God," that whatever Jackson has done they have sanctioned; that he spake, and they willed it; that he vetoed, and they voted with him; that he dictated, and they obeyed; is this not proof positive that their affections and their voices have ever sustained, have ever animated, have ever indulged, have ever justified and excused him? Such unexampled confidence, such unexampled constancy, such unexampled attachment and affection, were never witnessed before in any people towards any ruler; and I put it to the candor and sense of justice of all men to say, whether what the people have yielded to their favorite has not been more, trebly more, than reward enough for all his services and sacrifices, however great? Admitting the debt of their gratitude to him to have been ever so great, I ask if the debt has not been more than paid? Whether the President does not now owe more than he can ever pay to a generous people, who have confidingly, to a criminal degree, intrusted him with their all—their honors, their rights, their liberties, their sovereign power? Sir, what can one aged man, fast hurrying to the grave, pay to a people in consideration of what all the treasures of earth, and all the blood of them and their children, may not buy? Nothing! Nothing! Yes, yes, there is one boon, one sacred legacy, of incalculable value, which, in parting from them and the world, he might have left them. He might have left them the legacy of a patriot's advice. He might have left them the truth, and solemnly imprinted it upon their minds and memories forever, that "they had trusted him too much," and his advice to them, "never, never in their history, to trust another man as they had trusted him," and he might have returned to them their trust, and have restored them to their senses. This, and this only, would have repaid them. It would have restored to them what has been taken from them, which alone can compensate for itself.

The last message of such a President to such a people should have been the "farewell" of a father to his children. It should have been deep in wisdom, profound in its philosophy, hallowed in its lessons of virtue, calm in its tone and temper of reason, eloquent in its appeals, sublime in its moral, and passionate only in its fervent affection. It should have been the legacy of Augustus to his successors, the "farewell" address of Washington to his countrymen!

But this is the last annual message of Andrew Jackson! I would, for him and his country, that it was any thing but what it is. And why is it what it is? Gentlemen will pardon me—I mean nothing disrespectful to the President—when I say they know it is due to candor and truth to say—it is what it is, because it is not the message at all of Andrew Jackson! They know that, immediately upon the adjournment of the last session of Congress, the President and his prime ministers were dispersed from their duties at the seat of Government, and from the cares of public business, on their respective missions to the States of this Union. He of State bore despatches to Georgia, and "the Old Chief himself" was lugged along through Western Virginia, over

"Ruts and ridges,
And bridges
Made of planks

to Tennessee and Alabama. It is a pity, sir, that more of the people had not witnessed the executive electioneering tour; for then, perhaps, more of the States would have followed the example of Georgia and Tennessee, neither of which could be seduced or intimidated into the support of "the man"—a Tennessee toast said, "the dog"—as well as "the master." I am told that they carried him about like a lion for show, and made him roar like a lion. They had catechisms prepared for him, and the negotiations of the mission were conducted by preconceived questions and answers. A crowd would collect—on the highway or in the bar-rooms, no matter which—and some "village politician" of "the party" would inquire—"What think you, General, of such a man?" In a loud tone, much too stentorian for those lungs which are now lacerated, the answer rung—"He is a traitor, sir." "There, there!" repeated the demagogues to the crowd—"did you not hear that?" "What think you of another, General?" "He is a liar, sir!" "What of another?" "He is a black-cockade federalist!" Of another? "He made a speech for which he paid some stenographer five dollars!" And another was—"Of no account—no account, sir, and ought to be sent home to have his place supplied by a more efficient man;" and another was—"Upon the fence, sir—upon the fence!" "But, General, what think you of—Mr. (the first time Reuben was ever called mister!) Reuben M. Whitney?" "There is no just cause of complaint against Mr. Whitney, sir; he is as true a patriot as ever was; they are all liars who accuse him of aught wrong, and the official documents prove them to be so!" All the while these responses were repeated by the deacons of the service, and the people were called to give heed to them. Those who saw the farce and the frauds did heed them, sir—did heed them.

My friend [Mr. PEXTON] told them that they would kill him; that there was too much travel and fatigue; too much standing and talking; too much bustle and excitement for a weak and infirm old man to bear. But still they showed him about, in the heat of summer, and still they made him roar, until he frightened the people, who at last began to apprehend he was a lion come to devour their freedom of elections, and all else they valued as dear. Defeated in his mission, he at length became disgusted himself, chagrined, and mortified. He returned to Washington through Ohio, and, by the Guyandotte route, through Virginia again, and has been sick and disabled ever since. The loss of Tennessee, particularly the Hermitage, excited him still more, and this renewed excitement may have caused that hemorrhage at the lungs which has been pouring out the current of his life. At no moment since his return has he been able to write or dictate a message. There he has been lying, as it were, a dead lion, who could not even "shake the dew drop from his mane," and his couch of infirmity has been haunted by the Perennises and Cleanders of his palace as by vampires. In their hands has he fallen; and it is because this "last annual message" comes to us and the country reeking with the fumes of the kitchen cabinet that it is what it is!

What is it? The worst as well as the last annual message which Andrew Jackson even ever wrote—I had like to have said, ever sent to both Houses of Congress. Its vanity and egotism—its profane hypocrisy and solemn mockery of the good man's supplications to the Supreme Ruler of the Universe—its sophistical nonsense, showing its duplicity to a foreign Power, and concealing its real policy from ourselves—its low, ad captandum arguments, addressed to all the prejudices of ignorance and passion, to justify the most shameless attacks upon the currency for the vile purposes of licensed depredators on the public lands—its glaring falsehoods as to the most important facts of trade, currency, banks of deposit, and finance—its electioneering, continually harping upon an institution dead in fact, and thrice wounded since dead—its oft-repeated homily against one good bank, and its unblushing recommendation, in the same breath, of nearly half one hundred bad and irresponsible banks—its disingenuous attempts to reconcile glaring inconsistencies of the President on the deposit and distribution measures—its pitiful apologies for the disgrace of our arms by Ocoila—its bold recommendation of an increase of the standing army—its unjust attempt to cast censure, due to the errors and blunders of the administration itself, upon the shoulders of an innocent State officer, and then calling for an appropriation to repair these same errors, which it says are not those of this Government—its false claim of a national policy, founded in humanity towards the Indians—its reiterated jesuitical recommendation of an amendment of the constitution as to the election of President, which was never meant to be carried into effect by "the party," or to be any thing more than a topic with which to prejudice the people's minds against an election by the House—its impudent boast of the intelligence and patriotism of the successor, whom executive patronage and dictation have succeeded in electing—its shallow political economy—its demagoguism—its arts of vile deception and humbuggery—its rankling venom of party spirit—its miserable rhetoric, sinking below criticism—its groveling moral sentiment—its total want of all sage counsel or advice, and of all pathos and feeling—are all equalled only by its false certificate in chief to "the prosperous condition of all the various executive departments," to "the ability and integrity" with which they have been conducted, and to the fact of the President's belief "that there is no just cause of complaint, from any quarter, at the manner in which they have fulfilled the objects of their creation!"

Executive Administration.

[H. OF R.]

Now, sir, complaints have been loudly made from various quarters, in this House and by the press, by responsible persons, as to the condition of most of the executive departments, and as to the want of ability and integrity with which they have been conducted: and investigations by us of the truth or falsehood, justice or injustice, of these complaints, have heretofore been doggedly and repeatedly refused. "The party" were content with the mere affirmation by the President to the crowd of their innocence and purity, when he knew no more about their guilt than he knew of the facts of a certain event in this Capitol last winter, of which you and I, Mr. Chairman, knew all, and more than we wanted to know; about which, if the Tennessee papers are to be believed, the President has given another certificate, though he was more than a mile off, and there were at least seven fathoms of bricks and mortar and stone between him and the place of the occurrence. They have made him a witness in both cases, where it was impossible for him to be a witness; and in giving his testimony he has been compelled to resort to his "imagination for his facts." I cared nothing about the certificates of the President, so long as they abided in the ephemeral form of heated partisan declarations along the public roads, or so long as they were read from the stump merely, a thousand miles off. But, sir, this "certificate in chief" is no longer a mere tavern ipse dixit on the highway, but it is to be filed in the archives of this Government, as a part and parcel of the "last annual message" of the Greatest and Best! Perennis and Cleander have certified to their own good behaviour, innocence, and purity, have incorporated their certificate in the "last annual message," and have affixed to it the official sign manual of Andrew Jackson!

Is this certificate true? I put it to gentlemen if it be not true, whether injustice has not been done to Andrew Jackson, to those who have uttered just complaints, and to the public service, by this audacious forged self-acquittal?

Is it true or false, that the various executive departments have been conducted with ability and integrity, and that they are in a prosperous condition? That is the issue. How is it to be tried? Will gentlemen tell me that the President has tried the issue already, and that they are content with his certificate in form? Sir, I begin this session as I ended the last session, by asking the opportunity and power, and by claiming the right of an investigation by a committee, an efficient, able, and fair committee, with full powers to eviscerate the truth. The truth is all I desire. I make no accusations, no complaints, except of the denial of investigation.

If all have been conducted with ability and integrity, the departments have nothing to fear, and investigation may do great good. If it does not find and expose past fraud and corruption, it may prevent much evil hereafter, by the fear of scrutiny. I do sincerely, from the best of motives, earnestly desire to see the doors of the Treasury Department, of the land offices, of the Indian bureau, and of other departments and offices, thrown open to full and fair investigation. We then can have the facts, of which to judge for ourselves, and on which to make up our own verdict. It is the duty of the grand inquest to find or ignore a bill for itself, and of the venire to try the issue and find a verdict for itself. No judge, much more no party, shall find a bill, true or false, or render a verdict for them. Cleanse the Augean stables, say I; and I say more. The Numidian king, when he was carried a captive to Rome, and saw the corruptions of her citizens, returned from the city with contempt, and said, "Give me wealth, and I will buy up the whole republic." Fanny Wright, I believe, uttered a truth, that whenever you see two men talking together, there are ten chances to one they are talking on one of three subjects—"trade, politics, or religion." The three subjects have, since she wrote the remark, entirely amalgamated into two. Trade and politics have now become one. Some of the priests, I am told, are offering to join the union, and mammon is the god of this day's worship. Trade, sir, trade swallows up every thing!

Tell me not this is the short session. Investigation was refused last winter, when the session was long. I know, sir, that this is an inauspicious period, perhaps, to expect gentlemen to look back at the past, or to pause a moment on the present. I know that every eye is turned, and every mind of gentlemen is bent towards the future. "Coming events, which cast their shadows before," are much more dazzling to their hopes and fancies than painful truths of the past or the present are to their memories or their wills. They know, sir, that some of the swarm of "conservatives" which are now fat and full of the blood of the Treasury, must be driven off for some of the lank and hungry "locofoco" flies, who are voraciously eager to light upon this poor body politic of ours. All things may not become new, but there must be some changes; and for every change there will be a chance for some impatient expectant. I know that General Jackson has been made to say, in this "last annual message," "He that cometh after me is mightier than I," but he has not been made to add—"Whose fan is in his hand, and he will thoroughly purge his floor." Sir, lest he may not purge his floor, I wish it to be swept clean for him before he comes in, so that Jackson may not be blamed after he is gone.

Certain it is I cannot anticipate; time must develop the course and the policy of the coming administration. And let no one accuse me of commencing an attack upon it in advance. No, sir; so far from it, though I hold Mr. Van Buren responsible for most mischief that has been done, and most that is now doing; though he has been the caucus candidate for the presidency, and was the nominated successor; though he is elected by executive patronage, corruption, and dictation; though he succeeds at the expense of the elective franchise; though he is a minority President, and has promised to follow generally in the footsteps of this kitchen-cabinet administration: yet, if he bravely dares to falsify that promise, "more honored in the breach than in the observance," if he will kick away the base ladders by which he has climbed to the height of his ambition, if he will now leave Falstaff where he found him, and array around him the wisdom, intelligence, and virtue of the country, and base his administration on a sound, elevated, and enlightened policy, free from corruption, and purely patriotic, uncontaminated by party, I will pledge my humble support to his measures, though I never can support the man, or pardon the past examples he has set. And why cannot I support the man whilst I approve his measures? For the very reason that he has not "entered in at the straight gate." I shall always eschew the example which has been set in 1836, as I did that of 1825, in the election of President of these United States. The one example has been rebuked with a vengeance—the other will not be forgiven by me.

Sir, in this contest, one great battle only has been fought between power and the people. The result is known. The contest was not decisive, and must, as long as there is an honest heart to hope for freedom—shall go on until constitutional liberty, law, the independence of the people and their representatives, honesty, truth, and justice, are triumphant, or all are fettered in a despot's chains! Defeated, but not conquered; checked by the praetorian bands of patronage, but not arrested in their onward march, the patriot army is not discouraged or dismayed; smitten, but not struck down; the flag of the country is still flying! Defeat may drive some, the craven or the cormorant of spoils, from the standard of the true and the brave; but to the firm and proud spirits of the patriot band I would say, "Who shall separate us from the love of country?" Shall defeat? Another such defeat will be a glorious victory! In this "we are more than conquerors," for I am persuaded that neither office, nor bribe, nor principalities, nor powers, nor things present, nor things to come, shall be able to separate us from the love of our country, its laws, and its liberties! God only knows in whose name this victory shall be achieved; it matters not; but this I know, be he who he may, his cause will be consecrated by the toils, the prayers, the sacrifices, and the hopes, of the unsubdued and unterrified freeman. No, sir; let no man despair of the republic. The fight is not yet ended. The people are not yet vanquished. Their hosts are withdrawn only for the moment, to recruit their forces and to repair their broken weapons. The weapons of our warfare are the weapons of truth. It shall be my duty to assist in pointing anew its spears and its lances.

The question on the resolution was then taken without further debate, and carried: Ayes 86, noes 78.

So the resolution was adopted.

On motion of Mr. HARPER, the committee rose and reported the resolutions to the House.

And, on motion of Mr. EVERETT, the same were ordered to be printed.

The House then adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, DECEMBER 14.

Mr. A. MANN moved that the resolutions be read; and that the question be taken conjointly on all of them, except such as might be excepted to by any member; which motion prevailed.

The resolutions were then read, and the House concurred with the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, except those numbered 3, 12, and 15; which were excepted, on the suggestion of different members.

The third resolution, being one of those thus excepted, was read, as follows:

3. Resolved, That so much of the said message as relates to the finances and every thing connected therewith, the safe keeping of the public moneys and every thing connected therewith, and the Bank of the United States, including the stock in that institution, be referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. ADAMS moved to amend this resolution by inserting after the words "as relates to the finances and every thing connected therewith," the words "except so much thereof as relates to the protective duties and every thing connected therewith," and then to add to the end of the resolution the following words: "Resolved, That so much of the said message as relates to the protective duties, and every thing connected therewith, be referred to the Committee on Manufactures."

Mr. A. said he did not know that it would be necessary for him to state his reasons for proposing this amendment. He should imagine that they would strike the mind of every member of the House. For several years past, it had been the practice of the House to appoint a Committee on Manufactures, as one of the standing committees of the House, for the purpose of supervising what might be considered one of the great interests of the country. To that committee, heretofore, ever since its appointment, had been referred those parts which referred to that great interest. It was indeed a remarkable circumstance to him, that, in the whole message of the President of the United States, he (Mr. A.) could not discover any direct reference to that interest by name. Upon the perusal which he had given to it, he could not even find the name introduced; and it was probably for that reason that the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. LOYALL,] in dissecting the message, in its various parts, for reference, had not thought it necessary to introduce a resolution to refer any portion to the Committee on Manufactures. But when the message was considered in its general tenor and purport, and particularly that portion of it which related to the finances, to the deposite bill, to the distribution of the excess of revenue in the Treasury of the United States, and to the revenue altogether, there could not be found one sentence which bore in the most remote manner upon the great interest of manufactures.

It had been the pleasure of the House to appoint a standing committee for the protection of that interest, and it had been the pleasure of the Speaker to appoint him (Mr. A.) the chairman. He held himself bound, therefore, whatever might be his own opinions on the finances, on the revenue, on the deposite bill, or on the distribution of the surplus revenue, he held himself bound to consider, not his individual opinion, but the interest particularly committed to his charge, and to that of the associate members of that committee. He could not but feel surprised, therefore, to see that no more reference had been made to that interest than if no such interest existed. Was that the feeling of this House? Was that the feeling of the people of this nation? If so, one of the first things which he should have supposed that House would have done, would have been to abolish the Committee on Manufactures, from which all its duties would have been abstracted. For, if that interest was not of sufficient importance to the whole nation to receive even a notice in the message of the Chief Magistrate to Congress—to be noticed in the distribution of the message amongst the several standing committees of the House, certainly that interest must have sunk down so far into obscurity and decay as to become no sort of use in appointing a Committee on Manufactures.

In offering this resolution, Mr. A. said it was very far from his wish to assume the duties which, if the resolution was adopted, would be imposed upon the committee. He should be perfectly satisfied that his friend, the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, [Mr. CAMBRELEN,]—knowing, as he (Mr. A.) had known for years past, the feeling of that gentleman in relation to the manufacturing interest of this country—that he [Mr. C.] should have the whole management of the subject; that the committee to which that gentleman belonged should have imposed upon them the duty of deciding upon what articles that reduction of the revenue, which appeared in all quarters of the House, and in every section of the country, to be considered expedient, should take place. But the subject had nothing to do with the Committee of Ways and Means. The reference to that committee was not necessary as a Committee of Ways and Means, because their very name implied that they were appointed to see what revenue was raised for the expenses of the country, and upon what article it was raised. But they were not appointed to decide on what articles the duty should be taken off, because the very act of taking off duties affected other interests of this country. It is not the revenue of the country which is concerned; we have too much, and we want to give some of it away. Neither ways nor means were wanting; the country had too many ways, and, probably, too many means. But the interest of commerce, the interest of agriculture, the interest of manufactures, are all important interests; and most especially the interest of manufactures, which this House has so often declared should be protected. Now, so long as that interest exists, I ask, is it the feeling of this House that it should be disposed of in silence? Does it not still continue to be an interest which deserves the notice of this House?

Mr. A. said he had one other reason for asking that this interest should be heard, and that the committee charged with its protection should be authorized and directed to take it into consideration and report upon it. He had said he presumed there was no difference of opinion as to the propriety of a reduction of duties levied upon imports at this time; but to what extent that reduction should be carried, and upon what articles it was to bear, was a subject which had nothing at all to do with the Committee of Ways and Means. The subject must be considered with reference to the effect it would have on the other interests of the country, and especially the interest of manufactures. On the first day on which petitions were presented during the present session, he had presented a petition from eleven hundred citizens of Boston, praying for a reduction, not an absolute repeal, but a reduction of duties on foreign coal, a necessary of life; which reduction individually, and as a friend to Boston and the other large cities in the Union, he considered one of the most important, and as deserving to be one of the first of the articles to be considered on the question of reduction.

Individually speaking, he should be happy, not only if the object of that petition should be granted, but he should be perfectly content to refer it to the Committee of Ways and Means, on the simple question whether or not that duty was wanted for revenue. This is all within their jurisdiction. I should have been perfectly satisfied with that, and the determination of the House thereupon. I moved that the petition be referred to the Committee on Manufactures, and for the same reason for which I have now offered this resolution; and that was, because I knew any reduction on the article of coal must be considered with reference to its effects on the manufacturing interests of the country; with reference to its comparative effects upon bread stuffs, and every necessary of life; and, probably, in reference to other things. Accordingly, when a gentleman here, with a zeal which anticipated the message of the President of the United States, offered a resolution for the repeal of duties upon bread stuffs, the question of appropriate reference immediately arose; that gentleman proposed a reference to the Committee of Ways and Means, and another gentleman to the Committee on Agriculture. And, unquestionably, the repeal of duties on bread stuffs was interesting to the agriculture of the country and to the committee who were charged with its protection. So was it interesting to the manufacturers. It was not determined which of the committees the subject should go to, and I proposed to add the articles of coal and salt, also necessities of life. I proposed also the article of iron, one which affects my own constituents, and affects also the interest of certain States which, I hope, by their delegation here, will not allow the subject to pass without referring it to the Committees on Commerce and Agriculture of the country, as well as to the Committee of Ways and Means. These were his reasons for offering the resolution. If the House should think that the Committee of Ways and Means was the appropriate committee, far be it from him to complain. Such a course would be an alleviation to his duties on that committee, and he and the members appointed upon it with him might, from that moment, take a general holiday to the termination of the session.

Mr. CAMBRELENG said he did not rise to oppose the motion of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. ADAMS,] nor did he propose to enter into any debate. He (Mr. C.) was very happy to hear the gentleman from Massachusetts say that he had examined the President's message on the subject of protective duties, and he (Mr. C.) had no objection to refer any thing relating to the manufactures of the country to the appropriate committee. But the gentleman had made statements which required correction.

Mr. C. was understood to say that, two years ago, a memorial for the repeal of the duties on foreign coal had been sent to the Committee of Ways and Means, where it remained until reported on by the then chairman, the present Speaker of the House, and to instance similar references.

When (Mr. C. said) the Committee on Manufactures was established, and a portion of the duties of the Committee of Ways and Means had been transferred to the former, it was made their duty to examine the various commodities introduced into the country, and to select such articles as should be protected. The duties were not levied in those cases with any view to the revenue of the country. A revenue was collected, not to be put into the Treasury of the United States, but into the pockets of the capitalists engaged in that particular business. The duty of that committee was to see how many prohibitions should be imposed, and on what articles. But now we found ourselves in a different position. Millions upon millions had been collected under the system established in 1816. Now we had a revenue of forty or fifty millions beyond the wants of our Government; and the only question to be decided was, in what way the revenue should be brought to correspond with the wants of the Government. This was a question of finance, and not of manufactures. He believed that the whole discussion would result in the appointment of a select committee. Was it the province of the Committee on Agriculture, or Manufactures, or Commerce, to pass upon every interest in the country? The question would again come up on Monday, on a motion to postpone, and the House might then determine to whom the whole subject should be committed. In the mean time, he hoped that the discussion would terminate for the present.

Mr. ADAMS explained that he confined his proposition to so much of the President's message as related to the protective duties alone; and he asked for the yeas and nays on the adoption of the amendment. And the House ordered them.

Mr. HARRIN requested the Speaker to state the question to the House; which having been done,

Mr. MANN, of New York, said that this question of reference was one which had often been brought up before. He did not exactly know how far back the question had been considered, but he believed that, from the foundation of the Government up to the year 1806 or 1808, the Committee on Finance had had jurisdiction over all questions of raising the revenue; and that independently of all questions which might collaterally affect the interests of manufactures. At one time, for one or two sessions, the House determined that the Committee on Manufactures should have charge of all these questions; but a little experience soon taught the majority of the members of this House, who were not in favor of taxation to the extent of the power which it was supposed by some had been conferred by the constitution for the purpose of protecting the manufacturing interests, that this question and the things connected with it should be properly before the Committee of Ways and Means. Now, if the object of the amendment was to take from the Committee of Ways and Means those questions in relation to the reduction of a revenue already too large, he was opposed to it, because it did not come within the spirit of the rule which points out the duties which the several committees have to perform.

The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ADAMS] had complained of the President's message because there was no reference to the manufacturing interests. The gentleman might as well complain of the absence of reference too. Probably he might complain that there was no reference to the agriculture of the country, and yet he knew not what the Committee on Agriculture had to do with the duties on coal, inasmuch as coal was not an article of cultivation. He considered the reference to the Committee on Manufactures as inappropriate, and he hoped the House would send the subject, as heretofore, to the Committee of Ways and Means, to which it properly belonged.

Mr. DENNY thought it was difficult to determine precisely whether the Committee on Manufactures or of Ways and Means had jurisdiction, because they had, in some instances, equal jurisdiction, and because the subject referred might have connexion with the interests of both. One had charge of the revenue, the other of manufactures, or the domestic industry of the country. To protect that industry, it became necessary to levy duties. Hence the two committees came on common ground; and in referring the subject to the Committee on Manufactures, the House took nothing from the Committee of Ways and Means. It was still competent for the latter to take up the same subject, and to show how the question affected the revenue of the country, whilst the other committee showed how it affected the industry of the country.

He had no objection to giving the subject to the Committee of Ways and Means; in some respects, it would be proper; but he thought, when a great change, like the present, was proposed in the policy of the country, and which had been urgently recommended by the Chief Magistrate of the nation, the subject should go to the Committee on Manufactures, that they might present it to the House in all its bearings. He thought that the House had a right to complain that the President had neglected to make any reference to the home trade; that trade which employed many more millions than the foreign trade, and which had enriched the nation, and filled the Treasury with forty or fifty millions of surplus money. But it had not even been noticed. There was something behind all this darkness which ought to be brought to light, and he hoped the subject would be referred to the Committee on Manufactures.

Mr. PARKER thought that both the committees named might, with perfect propriety, have charge of the subject at the same time; one as a question of revenue, and the other looking to it as a question bearing on the particular interests on which the proposed reduction may operate. He would vote for such a reference. He wished that all the committees having charge, immediately or remotely, of these great interests, should investigate the subject, and give the result of their deliberations to the House.

Mr. BOON said that it had not been his intention to say one word on the question now before the House, had it not been for the most extraordinary doctrine advanced by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. DENNETT.] If the remarks of the gentleman could be confined to his own district, and to his own constituents, he would not reply to them at this time. But (said Mr. B.) the gentleman's speech will find its way, through the columns of the newspapers, into my district, and among my constituents. I should suppose, from the remarks of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, that he (if not a manufacturer himself) represents a manufacturing people; and to this I have no objections to urge. But (continued Mr. B.) my constituents are an agricultural people—they are the consumers of articles manufactured. The farmers and the mechanics are to be made poor for the purpose of enriching the manufacturers.

The gentleman has told us that there is now in the Treasury of the United States a surplus revenue, amounting to upwards of forty millions of dollars, and would have the people of this country to believe that this vast amount of money was derived from the manufacturers. Not so, Mr. Speaker. It is the result of over-taxing the people; it has been received from the customs and from the sales of the public lands. Upwards of twenty-four millions of dollars of the surplus revenue has been received from land sales. I have thought it proper to say thus much, with a view only to correct error, and to let facts go forth to the public.

I confess (said Mr. B.) my utter astonishment at the attack made upon the President by the venerable member from Massachusetts, [Mr. ADAMS.] That gentleman would have it believed that the President has neglected the great interests of the country in not having made particular mention of the manufacturing interest in his late message to Congress. Sir, (said Mr. B.) I presume that President Jackson's opinions on the subject of the tariff are made known in his previous messages to Congress; and I am sorry to say, that while the gentleman from Massachusetts was President of the United States, I was not able to know any thing of his opinions on that particular subject, as they were never expressed in any of his state papers to Congress. I think, therefore, it comes with a bad grace indeed from that gentleman, to charge upon General Jackson what he himself was deficient in performing while he was President.

Mr. PICKENS said that he approached this subject with some delicacy, and that he did not now rise for the purpose of entering into debate, but merely with a view to make known to the House the course which it was his intention to pursue. He was not willing to touch the subject of the reduction of the revenue or the tariff, unless in concert with those who were supposed to represent the great manufacturing interests of the confederacy; and the reason for this course was obvious. If he understood the act commonly called the "compromise act," he was disposed to regard it as an act passed under circumstances which ought peculiarly to imply good faith in all the different interests of the country. With this view, and as that act was still in operation, he was not disposed to touch the principles involved in it, except in concert and harmony with the representatives of the manufacturing interests. If it were not for the operation of that law, which, to a certain extent, implied good faith in all parties, he should state that the remarks of the member from New York [Mr. MANN] were correct; but, so long as that act was in operation, he (Mr. P.) was not inclined to interfere with the protective interests.

He should say that the gentleman's views were correct, except so far as regarded the act of 1816. That was a reduction of a war tax, with a view to the payment of the national debt, first; and, in settling that act, it must be regarded as a measure having in view the payment of the public debt, and not passed with any view to protection. It was essentially a measure for revenue; and, in settling the system under which it was made, due regard was had to the circumstances under which it sprang up. It was a tax bill for revenue to pay the public debt. But he had risen to say, merely, that he was disposed to move in connexion with the manufacturing interests. He was glad to hear the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ADAMS] express his belief that it was the opinion of all parties that some reduction could be made in the existing duties. So far as reduction on articles not in competition with domestic manufactures was concerned, he (Mr. P.) thought no difficulty would be raised. In fact, he believed that the bill which had been reported from the Senate during the last session of Congress embraced the true measure to be adopted now. He went upon the principle that the duties on those articles which did not come in competition with domestic manufactures ought to be repealed. But it seemed to him that they could not, with good faith, touch the great principles of the compromise. I wish, however, (said Mr. P.) to give the gentlemen representing the manufacturing interests an opportunity to be heard; and if the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ADAMS] thinks that the question of the reduction of the duty on foreign coal, for example, involves those interests, I am willing to give him charge of the subject.

But it appears to me, though I speak only theoretically, and not from practical experience on the subject, that that article is one the reduction of the duty on which cannot encroach on the manufacturing interests. But the question of the reduction of the duty on the importation of bread stuffs, it would appear to me, is of great importance to the manufacturing interests, and should be considered as a separate question. Mr. P. repeated that, though himself representing the great Southern interest, he wished to move, in respect to the tariff, with due regard to every other interest concerned in it.

Mr. BOULDIN followed, at some length, in explanation of his views of this subject. He, too, like the gentleman from South Carolina, would say, let the national faith be preserved, whatever be the consequences. If, by the compromise bill, as it was termed, or by any other act, Congress had bound itself to tax the people of the United States, whether the money was needed or not for the necessary expenses of the Government, however onerous it might be, he would still stand by the pledged faith of the Government. But he would not make the question of reducing taxation a question of faith until he was obliged to do so. Desirous as he was to have the revenue brought down to the amount necessary to an economical system of government, (if such a thing was possible,) he would first resort to all measures which could be adopted towards this end without touching the compromise. There being in this said compromise bill a clause providing, if he remembered right, that all duties under the rate of 20 per cent. might be taken off at any time, without touching the compromise, he would repeal all those duties, if the state of the revenue would justify it. Next, there was the revenue from the sales of the public lands. Those sales (Mr. B. said) might be stopped, and the amount of that branch of revenue, at least, be reduced, without touching the compromise. Would gentlemen say that those sales could not be stopped? Let the people, who actually want the lands, settle them—they will do it. (said he) whether you wish it or not—and do you then grant them the right of pre-emption. This was a privilege (Mr. B. said) which he had always voted to allow, whenever the question was presented to him. The land which is thus settled is rescued by these actual settlers from the savage and the wild beast, and to him who thus possesses himself we rightfully give the pre-emption. By stopping the sales of the public lands (Mr. B.

argued) you do not, as some gentlemen say, stop the settlement of the country. You stop the receipts of money for the sales; and, in doing so, perhaps prevent the loss which some persons seem to apprehend from its being deposited in banks which they fear to be insolvent, &c. The land could not run away, though the money might.

Mr. B. was willing, therefore, to stop the sales of land, and take off all taxes under twenty per cent.; and, if these reductions did not bring down the revenue to the wants of the Government, he was willing then to inquire, and faithfully and candidly inquire, whether the Government is so bound by national faith as to be obliged to continue to tax the people to pay the money which the Government does not want. Without concurring in all that others may have said on this subject, Mr. B. said he believed that such amounts of money as the present surplus revenue cannot be safely intrusted anywhere, either in regard to our own security or the honesty or purity of those into whose hands it may fall. Referring to discussions in the public journals on this subject, Mr. B. cited the language of a gentleman of the highest order of intellect in the country he came from, who had deeply deprecated the effect of the distribution bill on the States; and (said Mr. B.) he could not have a greater horror than I have of making the State of which I am a Representative dependent upon or looking up to the Government, as a creditor, for any sum of money—money advanced to the State, perhaps, when cotton is at twenty cents the pound, to be demanded back from it when cotton is at eight cents. To this feature of the distribution bill he was strongly adverse. If the money is our money, (said he,) why take our bond for it? If it be not ours, why offer it to us before we ask for it? At all times, and under all circumstances, from the foundation of the Government, a certain class of politicians had been feeling about for the means of seducing the States from their sovereignty and independence, to a state of dependency on the General Government. Who does not know that this is the case? Look back to the conflicts of your eloquent and sagacious men of former days—your Henrys and your Hamiltons—and trace the doctrines and acts of their followers, from that day to this, and you will find evidence enough of this.

We shall, (said Mr. B.,) if we go on in this way, be totally destroyed by our own money; for (he observed) not only will the proudest States on such a system talk in vain of their sovereignty, but the Federal Government also, placed in a position equally corrupting and dangerous, will partake of such corrupting influences, and the ruin and corruption will be general. Therefore, (said Mr. B.,) though I am an administration man, I am willing and desirous to inquire after any means by which a reduction of the revenue may be effected without a violation of the public faith.

If you rob me to-day of one hundred dollars, and to-morrow will give me back seventy-five dollars, I will take the seventy-five cheerfully enough; but if you go on doing so, first taking away my money, and then giving me back a part, I shall soon be ruined. Yes, said Mr. B., let me be as rich as the Treasury of the United States, it would ruin me shortly; and in the same way, if we rob the country of twenty millions, to return back afterwards fifteen millions, the country will soon be ruined. Shall we (said Mr. B.) go on gathering millions of taxes, when we do not want the money? Shall we take a man's horse and sell it for half its value for taxes, the proceeds of which are not wanted? Hence, (observed Mr. B.,) I should have been opposed to the distribution bill, except in connexion with such reduction of the revenue as would leave no more of it to distribute, &c.

Mr. HARDIN, after adverting to the wide range of debate which had been taken on this mere question of reference, observed that he was under no apprehension that the distribution of the surplus was to corrupt the people of the States. He did not consider it so easy a matter, nor did he conceive it necessary to reduce the tariff, in order to reduce the revenue. He contended that it was not the tariff which had given rise to a surplus, nor brought unnecessary money into the Treasury, for we know that the existing duties have not yielded more than upon a fair estimate they ought to have done. The cause of the superabundance of revenue was to be found in the inordinate thirst of speculation in Western lands. This (he said) was no permanent or durable source of revenue; its origin dated only one or two years back, and it could not be expected to last for many years to come. From the end of the war, say from the year 1815 up to the year 1834, on an average, the sales of public lands had not brought into the public Treasury more than two millions annually; since then, extravagant speculations throughout the whole United States had brought this extraordinary surplus into the Treasury. No one (said Mr. H.) can tell how long the goose will continue to lay golden eggs; but (said he) I am of opinion that in three or four years not an egg will be laid. All the lands in Mississippi, Alabama, and Louisiana, will be exhausted within that time; as also in Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois; they will soon all be gone. We cannot, therefore, calculate upon this as a long, lasting, and permanent source of revenue; it is both uncertain and short-lived. It is so uncertain that we ought not to touch the tariff, upon any calculation or reliance upon the public lands for revenue.

There are (proceeded Mr. H.) a great variety of conflicting interests concerned in the tariff, all of which demand attention, and which must be reconciled with each other; while, at the same time, no one of them ought to be sacrificed to another. We inhabit a country of vast extent, containing an almost infinite variety of climate and of productions; and that variety of interests, which grows out of these circumstances, being once nicely balanced in a well-regulated, or, as it has been frequently termed, a judicious tariff, ought not suddenly, and at every impulse, to be thrown into conflict and disorder. Such a balance ought not to be touched except by a gentle hand, and that the hand of a master, not of an apprentice. If (said Mr. H.) we proceed every year to touch this subject, because this year there happens to be a surplus of twenty millions, the result of great speculations in public lands, and because, another year, some other extraordinary circumstance occurs, the interests of the country will be jeopardized. I would not (said Mr. H.) raise one dollar from the people, on the principle of taxing them more than is absolutely necessary; but, at the same time, it is my desire to lay on every duty with a just, fair, and discriminating hand, so as to afford due protection to all the important interests of the country. I confess I was greatly astonished the other day when I heard a gentleman from the North, whose opinion it is that their woollen and cotton manufactures ought to be protected, bring forward a proposition to take off the duty from grain. Now, we in the West raise very little else but grain, and yet it is desired to deprive us of protection, and remove the duty from grain; but though the grain crops have failed this year in the East, they have not on the other side of the mountains. Again: Maryland has made great efforts and expenditures to open the way to a market for her coal; and now that they have almost arrived at Cumberland, where the supply will be abundant, we hear other gentlemen from other sections of the country propose to take off the duty from coal! So with salt, in the manufacture of which a capital of ten millions of dollars is invested west of the mountains; and now there are gentlemen who propose to take off the duty from salt! Others there are who would have molasses free, and sugar too, that we may make rum cheaper; whereas millions upon millions of capital in Louisiana are invested in the growth and manufacture of these staples. I am of the opinion (said Mr. H.) that if we proceed to touch these things we shall have a little bit of a war in this House.

The gentleman who last spoke [Mr. BOULDRIN] had said that he did not know what to do with the surplus in the Treasury; and he had also said a great deal about its corrupting effects, if distributed among the States. But (said Mr. H.) I put it to him, let him answer, whether the danger is greater if this surplus be equitably distributed among the States? Or, on the other hand, whether it be retained in banks subservient to the President; pet banks, ready to apply it for purposes of executive pleasure, and subject to executive will? Let him answer that! I, for my part, (continued Mr. H.) do not see any danger to be apprehended from corruption in the distribution of the surplus. What danger, for example, will his State, the "Old Dominion," suffer from two millions loaned to it for the great objects of education and internal improvement? Why, says the gentleman, with this aid for such great purposes, the States will succumb to the General Government! But, let me ask, who is it that makes the General Government? Is it not the people of the States? Is it not the States themselves? They also control the General Government as effectually as the potter moulds the clay to his purpose. There is nothing in this argument of his.

Mr. H. concluded by observing that he was in favor of the reference to the Committee of Ways and Means, not from partiality to that particular committee, but because (he said) we in the Western country have every thing to fear from any disturbance of the balance now established. Thirteen years ago (observed Mr. H.) our expenditure was thirteen millions, whereas now it is thirty! Let us but continue to progress at this rate of expenditure, and in a very short time we shall have a deficiency in the revenue instead of a surplus. It will soon, therefore, be quite unnecessary to discuss the question of a surplus. In the mean time, however, since a surplus momentarily exists, it is better and safer when lodged with the States than when deposited in banks subservient to the will of the Executive. These banks it is which will ruin the Government, if any thing; not the distribution; and yet they want to repeal the distribution bill; at least such is the talk out of doors. This money is not safe in these banks; it will not be forthcoming when called for; they will have to call in money from their debtors in order to pay, which they will not be able to do. It was by the distribution bill alone, against which now we hear so much, that the safety of this money can be secured; and (Mr. H. said) that measure should not be arrested or disturbed with his consent.

Mr. VANDERPOEL said, that though the debate had taken a wide range, he was not disappointed; for, at this crisis, every gentleman must know that no proposition could be introduced here, remotely bearing upon the question of protection, without provoking a most earnest debate. He would not now commit himself to any interest—he would reserve to himself the right of acting independently upon all propositions that might hereafter come before us touching that portion of our tariff that involved protecting duties; he would not even ask the representatives of any particular interest to "harmonize" with him before he acted. He would reserve to himself this right, this independence of action, though he had the honor to represent a district to a very great extent manufacturing. It was a district agricultural and manufacturing. He would here take occasion to say that his first object was to terminate a state of things by which millions and millions were annually taken from the pockets of the people, that were not required for the purposes of the Government; and if that great and desirable end could be obtained consistently with that protection which our manufacturers now enjoy, he would rejoice, yes, he would most heartily rejoice, for he felt for the great manufacturing interests of the country that solicitude which the representative of a district like his should feel. But if the alternative should be presented, "reduce the duties at once below the rates contained in the compromise bill, or accumulate in your Treasury millions and millions for years hereafter, for the demoralizing purpose of distribution," if such an alternative should be presented, he would meet it boldly and independently; because then the question would rise above any particular interest; it would be a question touching the interest of the whole country, not only for the present time, but for years to come. But he sincerely hoped, and still believed, that that trying alternative could still be guarded against; that we could select articles enough for reduction, that did not require protection, to bring down the revenue to the wants of the Government.

He would now say a word about the question immediately and legitimately under discussion. To what committee did the subjects embraced in the amendment of the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts properly belong? If to the Committee on Manufactures, then must the Committee of Ways and Means be an unimportant committee indeed; and this, too, instead of being what we have always supposed them to be—the most important committee of the House. Then would they only have to report to us what ways and means are necessary to keep the wheels of Government in motion, and ask the Committee on Manufactures to be so kind and condescending as to tell them out of what articles these "ways and means" must be raised. This would not only be depriving the Committee of Ways and Means of their appropriate functions, but would be against all precedent. What but the Committee of Ways and Means took cognizance of these subjects, when the "compromise" bill passed? He (Mr. V.) was not then a member of this House, but he was an attentive reader of its proceedings; and he well recollected that an honorable gentleman from the city of New York (Mr. Verplanck) was then chairman of the Ways and Means, and reported the bill upon which the compromise from the Senate was ingrafted. If it properly belonged to the Ways and Means then, why should it belong to the Committee on Manufactures now? No good reason had been urged for the change, and he should therefore vote against the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts; and Mr. V. concluded by expressing his regret that his colleague [Mr. CAMBRELENG] had shown a willingness to surrender any portion of his legitimate jurisdiction over the whole subject of the revenue.

Mr. BRIGGS, agreeing with gentlemen who had preceded him, that too wide a range had been taken in debate, said that he should not follow their example. The question before the House was one of simple reference; but it was one under the surface of which many important questions lay concealed. That part of the message which relates to the finances was proposed by the original resolution to be referred to the Committee on Finance. That was a right and proper reference, and in the spirit of the rules of the House. But there was one subject named in the President's message, which his colleague (for which Mr. B. said he was entitled to his thanks) had proposed to give a direction to such as it was altogether proper that it should take; and the gentleman from New York at the head of the Committee of Ways and Means [Mr. CAMBRELENG] had, with candor and propriety, said he would not oppose what appeared to him right and proper, though the gentleman's colleague [Mr. VANDERPOEL] had called him to account for it. Sir, (said Mr. B.,) if the House shall reject this proposition of my colleague, they will in effect declare that there are no duties for the Committee on Manufactures to perform; and their decision ought to be followed up by striking out that committee from the list of standing committees of the House. With this plain proposition before us, I call upon gentlemen from States representing that great interest in this House to vote on this question understandingly and deliberately; and if they are of opinion that the subject of protective duties does not belong to the Committee on Manufactures, but to the Committee on Finance; if the time has come when the only question on this subject is a question of finance, let it be so settled, and let the people understand accordingly. Gentlemen, in his opinion, (Mr. B. said,) present a false issue in this debate, when they ask, shall a question of finance be referred to the Committee on Manufactures? Whilst the true question is, whether a question of manufactures shall go to the Committee on Finance? There is in the President's message something—no matter how much or how little—there is still something in it which relates to protective duties; and that something, whatever it is, rightfully belongs to the jurisdiction of the Committee on Manufactures.

But, said Mr. B., the gentleman from New York raises a note of triumph because the President, in his last annual message, has omitted to bring to the attention of Congress our manufacturing interests. He congratulates the country upon the return to the principles of 1800. The gentleman most probably alluded to a later period in the history of the Government; but as he is a very young man, such a mistake is quite excusable. I presume, in his opinion, it was the administration of Mr. Jefferson which constituted the golden days of the republic. But if the gentleman looks to the executive messages of that illustrious President to sustain what he considers the doctrine of the last message in relation to the protective system, he will find himself sadly disappointed.

In his official communications, Mr. Jefferson expressed the deepest interest in the success of "internal manufactures." He commends them to the care of the National Legislature, and expresses the opinion that, "under the auspices of cheaper materials and subsistence, the freedom of labor from taxation, and of protecting duties and prohibitions, they will become permanent." These were the principles which directed the Government at the time to which the gentleman adverted. I regret extremely that they did not find more favor in the councils which produced the last message of the present Chief Magistrate.

For the interest of the country, I regret most deeply that the President should not have deemed the great manufacturing interests of the country worthy to be brought to the notice of the Legislature in his last annual message. It is a departure from the policy and principles which prevailed in those golden days of the republic of which the gentleman spoke, which the country may have cause to deplore. I wish it had been, what the gentleman erroneously supposed it was, on this subject, a return to the principles which then prevailed.

Mr. ADAMS made a few further observations in support of this proposition, to which, representing, as he did, a part of the country deeply interested in manufactures, he had thought it his duty to call the attention of the House. The chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means knew too well what had been the practice of the House in reference to this subject, to take the ground which his colleague [Mr. VANDERPOEL] had taken; he knew that the practice of the House had been to refer the subject of the tariff as well to the Committee on Manufactures as to the Committee of Ways and Means; which his colleague, who had not that gentleman's experience, it appeared, did not know. Mr. A. referred to the journals of the House for various precedents in support of his view of the practice of the House. At the 1st session of the 22d Congress, for example, upon the dissection of the President's message, a resolution was adopted that so much of it as related to finances, the public debt, the state of the revenue, &c., be referred to the Committee of Ways and Means. But there was adopted also another resolution, that so much of said message as relates to manufactures and a modification of the tariff be referred to the Committee on Manufactures. At that session, both these committees reported on the subject, &c. Mr. A. cited several other similar cases from the journals. In the course of his observations, Mr. A. alluded to what has been called the compromise bill, as a bill not matured in this House, but agreed upon between individuals in the other wing of the Capitol, without consulting the interests of the manufacturers, and sent here to be proposed as an amendment to the bill reported by the Committee of Ways and Means, and then passed as the bill of this House. He did not know that any member from Massachusetts, in this House or in the other House, had any agency in this movement. For his part, he said, he washed his hands of it altogether. Mr. A. concluded by saying that, if it be the pleasure of the House to exclude the Committee on Manufactures from all consideration of the interest of manufactures, he must of course submit to it. But, by the motion which he had made, he had at least taken care that he should not be chargeable with neglect of the duty with which he had been charged under a rule of the House.

Mr. TOUCEY wished, if practicable, or in order, for a division of the question. He said he was willing to refer the subject to both committees, in its twofold character; first, to call upon the Committee of Ways and Means to report their views upon it, as it related to the revenue; and, next, to refer it to the Committee on Manufactures, for their views as to its effect upon the subject of protecting duties. The amendment of Mr. ADAMS, he conceived, would take away from the committee even so much jurisdiction over the subject as every one admitted properly to belong to it.

Mr. EVERETT suggested a modification of the motion, by merely striking out the words of the original resolution, "and every thing connected therewith;" which, he thought, would, without the exception proposed by Mr. ADAMS, meet at the same time his views and those of the gentleman from Connecticut.

Mr. ADAMS would have been willing to allow the resolution to be adopted as it was originally reported, if it had not been so exclusive in its character. He was willing now to take the resolution as it stood, with the understanding that the House would pass the additional resolution which he had moved as part of his amendment. Mr. A. modified his motion accordingly.

The question was then taken on Mr. A.'s modified motion, to add the following:

"And resolved, That so much of the said message as relates to the protective duties, and every thing connected therewith, be referred to the Committee on Manufactures."

Mr. GILLET moved to amend Mr. ADAMS's resolution by inserting after "duties" the words "on manufactured articles." Rejected; and Mr. ADAMS's proposition was then adopted, and the third resolution was agreed to as thus amended.

The House then proceeded to the consideration of the 12th of the said resolutions; which is as follows:

12. Resolved, That so much of the said message as relates to amending the constitution of the United States, together with all propositions and resolutions submitted at the last and present sessions of Congress, proposing amendments to the constitution, be referred to a select committee, to be composed of nine members.

The President's Message.

A motion was made by Mr. GALBRAITH to insert in said resolution, after the word "resolutions," in the third line, "which have been or may be;" and to add at the end of said resolution, "and that said committee be required to make report on or before the 1st day of January next."

These propositions were rejected, and the 12th resolution agreed to by the House.

The 15th resolution was then read, as follows:

15. Resolved, That so much of the President's message as relates to the "condition of the various executive departments, the ability and integrity with which they have been conducted, the vigilant and faithful discharge of the public business in all of them, and the causes of complaint, from any quarter, at the manner in which they have fulfilled the objects of their creation," be referred to a select committee, to consist of nine members, with power to send for persons and papers, and with instructions to inquire into the condition of the various executive departments, the ability and integrity with which they have been conducted, into the manner in which the public business has been discharged in all of them, and into all causes of complaint, from any quarter, at the manner in which said departments, or their bureaus or offices, or any of their officers or agents, of every description whatever, directly or indirectly connected with them in any manner, officially or unofficially, in duties pertaining to the public interest, have fulfilled or failed to accomplish the objects of their creation, or have violated their duties, or have injured and impaired the public service and interest; and that said committee, in its inquiries, may refer to such periods of time as to them may seem expedient and proper.

Mr. PEARCE, of Rhode Island, said, as this subject was likely to give rise to debate, he would move an adjournment; but gave way to the CHAIR, to present an executive communication.

Mr. TALIAFERRO asked leave to submit a resolution providing for going into the election of a chaplain on the part of the House, at 2 o'clock on Friday, the 16th, but it was objected to.

The motion of Mr. PEARCE to adjourn recurring—

Mr. PEYTON wished to inquire of the gentleman if his motion to adjourn was predicated on his own intention to address the House on the subject of the resolution; because, if such was the case, Mr. P. would not oppose it.

Mr. PEARCE replied that he would claim no privilege on that account; and whether he should speak upon the question or not, he was not then prepared to say.

The House then adjourned.

THE PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE.

The House resumed the consideration of the fifteenth of the resolutions reported by the Committee of the Whole House on the 13th instant, on the President's message, which resolution is in the terms following:

Resolved, That so much of the President's message as relates to the "condition of the various executive departments, the ability and integrity with which they have been conducted, the vigilant and faithful discharge of the public business in all of them, and the causes of complaint, from any quarter, at the manner in which they have fulfilled the objects of their creation," be referred to a select committee, to consist of nine members, with power to send for persons and papers, and with instructions to inquire into the condition of the various executive departments, the ability and integrity with which they have been conducted, into the manner in which the public business has been discharged in all of them, and into all causes of complaint, from any quarter, at the manner in which said departments, or their bureaus or offices, or any of their officers or agents, of every description whatever, directly or indirectly connected with them in any manner, officially or unofficially, in duties pertaining to the public interest, have fulfilled or failed to accomplish the objects of their creation, or have violated their duties, or have injured and impaired the public service and interest; and that said committee, in its inquiries, may refer to such periods of time as to them may seem expedient and proper.

Mr. PEARCE, of Rhode Island, went at some length into an argument in opposition to the resolution. The resolution, he said, was predicated on a clause in the President's message which was not usual, and perhaps it was gratuitous on the part of the President. The question was, whether it was necessary, because the President, in his last annual message, with an overflow of feeling towards the heads of the executive departments—as he believed him to have the kindest feelings toward all men living—had thought proper to compliment them, it was necessary to have an investigating committee to ascertain whether he spoke the truth. Although it was not the usual course, still the President had a precedent. Many years ago, Mr. Monroe stepped out of the usual course to compliment the then head of the War Department, [Mr. CALHOUN.] But because he did this, no committee was raised to ascertain whether or not the compliment was deserved. He was opposed to the resolution, because the direct object of it was to ascertain whether the President spoke the truth or not. He then went on to show that all the subjects contemplated to be investigated by this proposed select committee were provided for by the House in the appointment of the standing committees. Among these committees was that of Ways and Means; and it was the duty of that committee to take into consideration and report upon all "such reports of the Treasury Department, and all such propositions relative to the revenue, as might be referred to them by the House; to inquire into the state of the public debt or the revenue, and of the expenditures, and to report from time to time their opinion thereon; to examine into the state of the several public departments, and particularly into the laws making appropriations of moneys, and to report whether the moneys have been disbursed conformably with such laws; and also to report from time to time such provisions and arrangements as may be necessary to add to the economy of the departments, and the accountability of their officers." That committee was required to do all that any select committee, however raised, could do. Besides this, there were other committees, whose duty it was to examine into the condition of the departments, and the expenditures thereof. Every gentleman must recollect that, at the last session of Congress, a gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. SUMNER], chairman of one of these committees, investigated the affairs of some of these departments, made a report, and the report was acted on by the House; and could not that heretofore done be again done? He submitted to the House, then, to say whether this resolution was not gratuitous, uncalled for, and had nothing to justify it, except the paragraph alluded to in the President's message. Another objection he had to it was, that gentlemen said it was not intended to be raised, out of any hostile feeling to the President of the United States. Well, what were the Secretary of State, Treasury, War, Navy, &c.? They were the mere mouth-pieces of the President; men selected to do what he could not do himself. Mr. P. read the law relating to the Department of State, showing his duties, and showing that the head of that Department was created to do for the President, under the law, that which the President could not do in person. How, then, could gentlemen say that the President was not implicated, when the acts of his ministers were nothing more nor less than his acts? Let gentlemen take the bull by the horns. If they had any allegations to make against the President, let them do so in form. While passing on the acts of his principal public officers, they necessarily passed on the acts of the President himself. He then proceeded to show that the laws of the land threw around individuals certain guards; they were not to be arraigned without notice, &c. But how were the heads of these departments to be heard and tried under the resolution? They were to have no hearing and no trial, and were to be disfranchised and divested of their rights, upon the mere rumors of newspapers and gossip of old women. There never was a committee raised upon mere suggestion and gossip, without something like a charge or an allegation. Then let the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. WISE,] or any other gentleman, make out a charge against the President, and he might have as large a committee, and have it clothed with what powers he pleased; but until this course should be adopted, he was, and should be, opposed to the adoption of the resolution. Who could tell what powers this committee might assume? It might require the departments to submit to it all matters connected with removal, or it might assume any other authority it pleased. The resolution claimed a greater scope for the committee than was ever granted to a committee of that House, or any other legislative tribunal. When were its powers to cease? Who could tell this? From the form of the resolution, never; because they were to take cognizance of all matters, from all quarters of the Union; from every town, village, city, and hamlet; all causes of complaint, from responsible and irresponsible sources; of all the ten thousand charges which an old lady, who had charge of a paper in this city, had made, and the ten thousand more which she probably would make.

The President's Message.

But, sir, said Mr. P., this was to be somewhat an ex parte proceeding. Suppose the heads of some of these departments shall have done some commendable acts. The committee will not be bound nor required to look into it. No, sir, their object will be to arraign them and bring them to trial, and inflict punishment upon them. Perhaps the committee might wish to inquire into the causes which take some of the heads of departments home to their native States, to ascertain whether they want to operate on the politics of such States. Well, sir, the Secretary of State went home during the last summer; and, if his object was to operate on the politics of Georgia, he met with but poor success. The Secretary of the Navy also went home; but his going, if he did go for political effect, only added to the strength of the party opposed to him. If the results in those States were the consequence of their visits, it would have been much better they had not gone. But suppose, as the President has said, that all of the heads of these departments shall have faithfully done their duty, we shall have no report from this committee on the subject. It was to be a fault-finding committee; their object was to condemn, and not to compliment the President or his ministers. If there was want of fidelity in the departments, you would have no report from this committee. Although the Secretary of the Treasury may have his Department in such a condition that any thing which is brought against it, either from ghost or goblin damned, could not effect it; although the Postmaster General may have produced order out of chaos, and although the Secretary of War may have discharged with the greatest ability two offices, not a word will be said in their favor by this committee: their object, ex vi termini, will be to undo what the President has done; or, failing in that, they will do nothing. Committees of that House were raised for special causes, for causes shown. What were the causes shown why this committee should be raised?

What were the specifications? Then, unless they were to innovate on the rules of the House, they could not adopt this resolution in its present form. Let a resolution be introduced in due form, and he imagined no friend of the Executive on that floor would shrink from an investigation. Let the charges be made against the Executive and his ministers, jointly and severally, and he thought he could safely say none would shrink from the investigation. It was not his business to go into Roman history, from the age of Augustus to that of Tiberius, for the purpose of finding out examples of men who had waded through blood to power; and if he did so, it was only for instruction, and to make him the more happy that he lived in a country where none of those scenes were enacted.

Many men, Mr. P. said, changed their minds and opinions of men, and got to disapprove the course of those they used to admire.

[Mr. WISE said, if the gentleman alluded to him, he must inform him that he never was in the situation of the gentleman from Rhode Island in his life.]

Mr. PEARCE proceeded. The character of a nation depended very much on the character of the individuals at the head of the Government. No nation was rendered more valuable by their resources than by the character and reputation of the individual who presided over it. Why did Virginia hold herself so high? It might be somewhat on account of her soil, climate, and resources, but more because of her Washington, her Henrys, her Jeffersons, and her Madisons. Their characters not only gave character to Virginia, but to all the States. Why was he (Mr. P.) proud of the little State he had the honor, in part, to represent? He, to be sure, might be proud of her great resources; but more proud, because it was the land of Greene and Perry. Seven cities contended for the honor of giving birth to Homer; and tyrannical as Napoleon might have been, his name was revered by most of the French nation. What would England, the fast-anchored isle of the ocean, have been, if it was not for her poets, her philosophers, and her statesmen?

Mr. P. concluded by repeating that he could not vote for the resolution in its present form; and at the same time said he would not shrink from the responsibility of an investigation, if a proper committee was raised. He submitted to the House the following amendment: Strike out all after the word "Resolved," and insert the following:

"That so much of the President's message as is in the following words, to wit: 'Before concluding this paper, I think it is due to the various executive departments to bear testimony to their prosperous condition, and to the ability and integrity with which they have been conducted. It has been my aim to enforce in all of them a vigilant and faithful discharge of the public business; and it is gratifying to me to believe that there is no just cause of complaint, from any quarter, at the manner in which they have fulfilled the objects of their creation,' be referred to a select committee of nine members, with instructions to inquire into any specific causes of complaint which may be alleged against the integrity of the administration of any of the departments or their bureaus, or the vigilance and fidelity with which their duties have been discharged; and that said committee have power to send for persons and papers."

Mr. PEYTON rose and addressed the Chair as follows:

Mr. Speaker: I was, at first, somewhat surprised that the gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. PEARCE] should be found in opposition to this investigation. That gentleman was once the zealous advocate of rigid scrutiny into all abuses committed by public functionaries. In an elaborate speech, upon this floor, he once sustained an investigation similar to the one now proposed by my friend from Virginia, [Mr. WISE.] I allude to the case of the Wiscasset collector. But, sir, the gentleman announces the fact that he has changed. He was then opposed to General Jackson—violently and bitterly opposed to him—and he manifested that opposition in every conceivable way, and upon every subject that arose. But having now become a Jackson man, he has undergone, it seems, a complete political transformation. And what a change! his old principles discarded, his mental vision in total and disastrous eclipse, he has closed his eyes upon fraud, and peculation, and plunder!

The President's Message.

But, sir, has it come to this, that the gentleman from Rhode Island is put forward as the champion of Andrew Jackson? Has that distinguished citizen already sunk so low that his fame and reputation are committed to the keeping of such hands? Oh, spectacle, mortifying and humiliating, to the honest friends and original supporters of Andrew Jackson! those who fought with him, and voted for him! who advocated his first election upon principle, and who, unlike the gentleman, yet stand up the dauntless advocates of the same principles! What must they think, how must they feel, when they are informed that the President's reputation as a statesman has fallen into the custody of that gentleman, who, formerly a violent, loathed, and detested assailant, has thrown himself into the current of the President's popularity, strong enough to bear even him along, and is now become his pretended fulsome eulogist and defender?

But, sir, to the gentleman's objections, or rather his pretended objections, to the proposed inquiry. He has given a striking specimen of the cunning and tact of the sect to which he belongs, by the issue which he has made up—a false, hypocritical issue. What is it? Why, forsooth, that it involves the President's veracity! that it will be, does the President speak the truth when he says that all the officers are "honest" as well as capable! and that he, good tender-hearted man, cannot endure to hear any thing which infringes, in the slightest degree, upon the veracity of that high functionary. Under this false and fraudulent issue the gentleman takes shelter, and expects to escape all inquiry, all investigation. Is argument required to expose a position so monstrous? Will not every high-minded man in the nation look upon it with scorn and indignation? Sir, I deny and denounce this as that false issue which has so long been the shield of the party, and behind which they always skulk at the slightest approach of danger. The President says that they are honest, and the gentleman says you are not to prove them to be rogues, because that would be to make out the President a liar. What a position!

Did the President write the paragraph in his message, laudatory of these officers, which the gentleman himself admits is unusual in such a document, and which, I am sure, has no precedent or parallel? No, sir, not one word of it; and he does not know, at this moment, that it is there. What is it, sir, which these gentlemen, so able and so honest, have introduced into the message, and now claim that it is evidence of so high and sacred a nature that it cannot be examined or impeached? Here it is:

"Before concluding this paper, I think it due to the various executive departments to bear testimony to their prosperous condition, and to the ability and integrity with which they have been conducted. It has been my aim to enforce in all of them a vigilant and faithful discharge of the public business; and it is gratifying to me to believe that there is no just cause of complaint, from any quarter, at the manner in which they have fulfilled the objects of their creation."

Did Andrew Jackson write this sweeping certificate of moral character for these gentlemen? No, sir, no. I plead non est factum. It is not his deed. They have fraudulently smuggled it into his message, to evade scrutiny into their conduct. Instead of stifling inquiry, it is of itself a cause of suspicion. I say, sir, that the President did not write it; in support of which avowal I have evidence satisfactory, at least to my own mind, and such as should be made known to this House, to the country at large, and to posterity. It should thus be made known, in order to shield the name and fame of the President from that imputation which, in all time to come, would attach to them, in consequence of this flagrant abuse of the confidence reposed by him in others. The committee on the part of the Senate, which, according to usage, was appointed to wait upon the President at the commencement of the session, and inform him of the readiness of Congress to receive the very message in question, found him extended on a sick couch, scarcely able to raise his hand. On the eve of their departure, he urged the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. GRUNDY] to come back soon, and talk with him; that he was lonesome, wanted company, and wished to have his friends about him. The Senator (alas, that it should be necessary for him to invoke the attendance of friends, and of such friends!) did return, and remained with the President more than an hour, during which time he never alluded to the subject of politics. He spoke of dying, of the Hermitage, of his hope that he might be spared till he could reach it in the spring. His thoughts were with his heart, "and that was far away," dwelling upon other and doubtless holier meditations than writing eulogies upon public functionaries, whose conduct he was in no situation to examine, and who, if they were honest, needed not his testimony to the fact.

But the gentleman from Rhode Island has another objection to the mode of proceeding proposed by my friend from Virginia. He says that it is unnecessary, because, by the standing rules of the House, the investigation into all such matters is enjoined, as a duty, upon the Committee of Ways and Means. The rule alluded to by the gentleman reads as follows: "It shall be the duty of the Committee of Ways and Means to take into consideration all such reports of the Treasury Department, and all such propositions relative to the revenue, as may be referred to them by the House, &c.; to examine into the state of the several public departments, and particularly into the laws making appropriations of moneys, and to report whether the moneys have been disbursed conformably with such laws; and also to report, from time to time, such provisions and arrangements as may be necessary to add to the economy of the departments, and to the accountability of their officers." And yet the gentleman, in a subsequent part of his argument, contended that the exercise, by the House, of such a power as is hereby enjoined upon one of its standing committees, would be a disfranchisement of the heads of departments! An ex parte trial and conviction, according to the rules of the common law! The rule referred to by the gentleman shows the sense entertained by the House in relation to the necessity of such investigations as the one proposed into the state and condition of the several departments, with a view to the rigid accountability of public officers, and the legal disbursement of the public moneys.

But, sir, is the Committee of Ways and Means the appropriate committee to make such examinations? Look at the past. How long have complaints of malversation in office been ringing in the ears of gentlemen? Look at the formation of that committee. Its chairman [Mr. CAMBRELENG] labors under a political, if not a legal, disability to institute and conduct them with efficiency. Dare he move in such a cause? No, sir; he would seal his fate forever. But if that committee were forced by the House into the investigation, with what hope of success could we rely upon it? The head of each department would hand over to the chairman of that committee such a statement as he might choose to send here.

Why, sir, it would be like the trial of Reuben M. Whitney. Reuben has been tried, and, as you will be glad to hear, acquitted, since the last session. But how tried? Not by a committee of this House? No, sir; he was tried on the other side of the Alleghanies, while the witnesses and the prosecutor were a thousand miles off. He was tried at Jonesborough, Tennessee, before the President of the United States; the prosecutor not my friend from Virginia, [Mr. Wise,] but one John Kennedy, who prosecuted Reuben so handsomely, that he has since been rewarded by an appointment. Reuben was arraigned before the President in a large crowd, the charges against him so drawn up that they could all be answered in his favor without touching the true issues which involve his guilt or innocence. They, in effect, asked the President—is Reuben a saint, or is he a sinner? “He is a persecuted patriot, sir; persecuted on account of his opposition to the United States Bank.” “There!” said they, “do you hear that?” and the shout, hurra for Reuben, was loud and long. But, sir, the gentleman chose to wander from the subject before the House, and carry this political war into Tennessee. This is contrary to the policy of his State during the late war with Great Britain. She then had a higher regard for State lines and State sovereignty; her patriotism was only commensurate with her small limits.

He represents the President as going to the Hermitage on private business, and seems to justify all which his party attempted to achieve by the President's visit to Tennessee. A private visit to the Hermitage! They scarcely gave him time to shake hands with the old family servants at the Hermitage. He was hurried from place to place, dragged along through dust and heat to public meetings, at towns, and villages, and cross-roads, and country stores; carried through Tennessee and Alabama; brought back, and taken through Kentucky, by the way of Cincinnati, to Washington. The friends of Mr. Van Buren resorted to every art to excite and induce him to take an active part in the election; and they now talk of a private visit to the Hermitage! Sir, I was told this morning, as I entered the Capitol, that some one of the members from Tennessee denied certain facts which every one there knows to be true. I hope, sir, that no such denial has been made. But, if it has, I stand ready to meet the gentleman, and maintain the truth of those facts any where. The President assailed me for the course which he said I had pursued in relation to the bill which contained the appropriation to carry into effect the Cherokee treaty, before he left the city, which complaint he frequently repeated on his way to the Hermitage. At Knoxville, a gentleman produced the Globe newspaper, which showed that I had voted and spoken in support of that measure. But it had no effect, for he continued to speak of it as he had done before. At Sparta, he denounced my friend from Virginia [Mr. Wise] as a liar. At the house of Mrs. Saunders, in Sumner county, Tennessee, he stated that my colleague [Mr. Bell] “told twenty lies in one speech; and knew them to be lies at the time;” and that Peyton was a greater liar than Bell. In passing through the district of my colleague, [Mr. Forester,] his very able speech at the last session of Congress having been mentioned, the President stated that any man could get as good a speech as that written at Washington for five dollars.” When asked how Mr. Huntsman was, in relation to political parties, “He is on the fence,” said the General, “and no one knows which side he will fall.” The constituents of another one of my colleagues inquired, “Well, General, what do you think of our representative, Mr. Shields?” “Oh!” said he, “he is of no account, sir, no account; turn him out, and send some one in his place who is of some account.” I have repeated these things, sir, not on account of any pleasure they afford me, but because those very gentlemen who were the cause of these exhibitions are now denying them. Let any man deny this statement who dare.

But the gentleman from Rhode Island calls upon us to take “the bull by the horns;” “to move an impeachment against the President at once;” says that “he is accountable for the acts of his ministers, and any attack upon them is in effect an impeachment of him.” This is strange doctrine to me, sir. We wish to rope these calves, and drag them, bleating as they go, from the Treasury, for they have been sucking too long already; and the gentleman says no, “take the bull by the horns.” Move an impeachment against the President, indeed! He accountable, criminally accountable for the want of integrity on the part of his ministers! Was there ever any thing more impudent than this? Because General Jackson is a patriot, does it follow that Reuben M. Whitney is any thing but what the world knows him to be? Because General Jackson is an honest man, does it follow that Amos Kendall, and all the other “hirelings,” as he calls them, are honest too? This, sir, is the doctrine of the party—the doctrine of men into whose hands the government of the country has fallen. But, sir, the gentleman, in thus shuffling himself under the protecting mantle of the President, but displays the usual tact of the party to which he belongs. They are all patriots, if the President be a patriot. They are all honest men, if the President be an honest man. Sir, let me put a case in common life to illustrate this doctrine; one which every farmer will understand. Take any man of seventy years of age, put him on a farm with sixty hands to control, give him a full crop—corn, tobacco, and small grain—can he manage them so that no part of the crop will suffer? Suppose his foremen are faithless and roguish, that they are detected marauding the country of nights, taken with their pigs and turkeys, their chickens and potatoes, upon them, could they plead the virtues of their master as a justification of their crimes? Could you not lynch them without meaning to inflict blows upon the good old man whose confidence they had abused? There is no man amongst them who can stand one moment upon his own merits. No, sir; they have crowded and huddled together under the mantle of General Jackson, until that is not broad enough to cover them; they have worn it threadbare, stretched and torn it into tatters. You may occasionally get a glimpse of Van's bald pate popped out here, Amos's sharp face there, Felix's red eyes yonder, Blair's shank at one place, and Reuben's pockets filled with Treasury receipts at another; and now, sir, we have the gentleman from Rhode Island squealing around like an odd pig, for whom there is no test, hunting a place to crawl in at. Now, sir, what I wish is, to strip the Jackson mantle off these gentlemen, and let them stand up for themselves. Every one knows that no gentleman upon this floor has any motive, any wish, to make an issue with General Jackson; that he cannot be the object of this resolution. His course is run, his day is past, his power is in other hands, and we wish to hold those gentlemen accountable for the manner in which they exercise it. There has been no investigation into the departments, which we propose to examine, for the last eight years. We wish to see a settlement of their accounts at the bar of the public, and the balance fairly struck between them and the people. They may be honest, very honest; if so, it is due to themselves that they show it. It may be otherwise; and, in that event, it is due to the country that we should have a committee of the House to show that. How is it proposed that they shall come to trial? Upon the certificate contained in the message, and upon that alone. The gentleman himself admits that these sweeping certificates are unusual. I detest the whole system of certifying which pervades every department of the Government, and can be traced from Reuben M. Whitney up, (I believe you cannot go from Reuben down.) Yes, sir, a coward, who shrinks and runs from an adversary whom he has injured, will get a certificate of his courage to use upon the stump; a traitor will get a certificate of his patriotism; a rogue of his honesty; and a perjured witness of his veracity; and if you attempt to fix upon either of these his true character, he will ensconce himself behind his certificate. We ask permission to go into the various departments, and see what their true condition is.

The President's Message.

But, says the gentleman, that is equivalent to an impeachment of the President, for here is his statement that all is well; "that there is no just cause of complaint from any quarter;" and the argument is, that if you find just cause of complaint, it will show that what the President has said is not true; and, therefore, if you do not mean to attack the President, there must be no examination whatever. We hold these officers, whose conduct we propose to examine, to be trustees; and we have reason to believe that they have abused their trust, and abused the confidence of the President, and demand that they shall give an account of their own conduct to the representatives of the people, and are met at once, and told that you are putting the President upon his trial; it is an impeachment against him; make out your specifications and summon him to the bar of the Senate. All we ask, sir, is, that the representatives of the American people shall send a committee and examine the archives, records, and papers of their own Government, in any and all of its departments, and make their report of the facts to this House. We propose no criminal prosecution against any one, but an investigation into the condition of the departments, and the honesty and fidelity of the public agents; and this the gentleman calls disfranchisement under the common law. He was eloquent and extravagant in his eulogiums upon the heads of these departments; he spouted their praises in poetry, and I suppose he means they shall live in song and story. He says the Secretary of the Treasury has not slept upon his arms. No, sir, he has not slept; and the party should feel under the highest obligations to him, for he has so contrived as to make the Treasury and the public lands a powerful auxiliary to Mr. Van Buren in the late election. By the celebrated Treasury order, which he issued, requiring specie in payment for the public lands, with an exception in favor of citizens of the States in which those lands are situated, he in effect offered a bribe of one hundred dollars a head for votes in the States of Mississippi, Arkansas, Missouri, and Michigan, which was then looked upon as a State. For, sir, at the sale of public lands in Mississippi last fall, specie was worth at one time twenty per cent.; and, while the citizens of Tennessee, then considered in rebellion against Mr. Van Buren, were required to pay this enormous tax, the citizens of Mississippi, a doubtful State in the election, were exempt from it. At Government price, three hundred and twenty acres of land would cost the Mississippian four hundred dollars, while the Tennessean, for the same quantity, was compelled to pay the sum of five hundred dollars, from the necessity he was placed under, by this order, of raising specie. And, sir, this was not confined to the poor and needy, but extended to the nabob, with his hundreds of hands and thousands of bales, while the specie was exacted from the most indigent and meritorious Tennessean. This, sir, is what I call high-handed oppression on the one side, and wholesale bribery and corruption on the other. Philip of Macedon never made a more unblushing use of money to corrupt and enslave the people of Greece. This Secretary must be entitled to the praise, and something more substantial still, to a portion of the spoils of the party. The gentleman alluded, also, to the visit of the Secretary of State (Mr. Forsyth) to Georgia, which he calls unfortunate; true, his visit was unfortunate; and of the visit of the Secretary of the Navy (Mr. Dickerson) to New Jersey, which was also unfortunate. He seems unwilling to give them any credit for well-meant exertions, and "wishes to God they had staid at home." This appears rather ungrateful, as they used their best exertions in the cause. It is true the gentleman attempts to conceal the fact; but it is notorious that the Secretary of State went to Georgia, and used every effort to rally his shattered forces; that he was openly electioneering for Mr. Van Buren. Amos, too, if I was correctly informed, made an excursion, for a like purpose, into New England. I am sure that I saw it stated that he had his face lithographed, and copies sent through the country, so that those who could not see "the divine original might at least gaze on love's counterfeit."

But, sir, the gentleman assumes another ground in defence of these "ministers," as he calls them. He says the appointment of this committee would amount to a disfranchisement of those officers whose conduct it is proposed to scrutinize, by denying to them a trial according to the strict rules of the criminal law. This principle holds only where a man is on trial for crime. All laws are to be liberally expounded, so as to detect fraud, but strictly construed when you come to punish a criminal. The gentleman goes too fast; he leaps to the conclusion, leaving us at the beginning of this matter; while we are commencing the development of fraud and corruption, which the law abhors, he anticipates the awful result which may be brought about, and is appealing to your sympathy on behalf of the culprit. Now, if he will be patient, we will go on with him, and in due season we will lean to the side of mercy, and acquit wherever there is reasonable doubt. This is strange doctrine to come from that side of the House. These officers are the trustees of the people, and accountable to the people. They have been long in office, and are about entering upon a new lease; and now, when called upon to make an exhibition of their fidelity and ability, their friends upon this floor raise the cry of disfranchisement and summary punishment. I deny and utterly repudiate this doctrine. Sir, in private life, no one denies the right of a principal to look into the conduct of his agent. What would that principal think of an agent who would shut his books and say, I claim protection under the criminal code; you cannot examine these books, lest it may lead to a prosecution against me? What honest man would not say at once he was guilty? What judge would sustain the objection for an instant? Take the case of a guardian: a motion is made in court, a committee is appointed, and he is brought forthwith to a settlement; could he object, on the ground that the examination of his accounts might develop crime, and lead to punishment? And, sir, have not the American people the same power over these keepers of their treasure, and guardians of their constitution, laws, and liberties, which a court of justice can exercise over the guardian of an estate and the children who own it? Sir, because investigation may lead to such a discovery, it does not preclude investigation altogether. The gentleman's fancy seems to be haunted by the idea of criminal prosecutions and penitentiary punishments. Well, sir, his fancies may be realized; he may know something calculated to excite his alarm; it may lead to that, and I would not be surprised if, in some instances, it did; but we move no impeachment, no indictment, no presentment, at this time. We merely ask that this House, as the great inquest of the nation, shall inquire into the state of the departments; and upon a report of facts, by a committee, it will then be able to determine what steps are proper to be taken. If crime is developed in any quarter, then it will be the proper time to bring offenders to trial, and they shall have all the benefits of the strict rules of common law, and criminal law, and the benefit of clergy likewise. Sir, there is something "rotten in Denmark," or we would not have this resolute and continued opposition to all investigation, which is calculated to show mismanagement on the part of agents and officers of Government. At the adjournment of the last session of Congress there were pending motions and resolutions calculated to effect objects similar to those contemplated by this resolution, and they were all smothered by the party to which the gentleman belongs, and, I believe, with his assistance. The gentleman dreads a select committee, while he is willing to go to trial upon the certificate of the President, and seems to have full confidence in the result, if the matter be intrusted to the Committee of Ways and Means. Yet, sir, he is alarmed at the idea of a select committee, and says it will be a "fault-finding, censorious committee." Have the gentleman and his friends any thing to dread in the appointment of this committee? Is the Speaker subject to the suspicion of doing injustice to any of the party in the appointment of committees? Sir, is it not a matter of absolute certainty that a majority of this committee, if appointed, will be composed of the friends of these officers? Cannot those gentlemen meet their own friends without fear and trembling? Is there not virtue and talent in this House sufficient to guaranty protection to the innocent, as well as to insure the detection and exposure of the guilty? Are gentlemen willing that it shall be understood, and go abroad to the country, that they cannot face such a committee, composed of gentlemen of the highest honor and purest principle, even though they are their own friends? And these, too, are the men in whose hands the Government of the country is placed, and who claim to be above suspicion, beyond the power of this House, fortified in upon all sides by the ramparts of the President's certificate.

There is one other position assumed by the gentleman from Rhode Island, which is quite original, and merits particular attention; it is this, sir: that the direction given at the last session to the bill commonly called the executive patronage bill is conclusive as to the views of this House upon the subject of executive patronage. And he seems to draw an inference that the House then gave its sanction to all that had been or would be done in the way of executive patronage, in all its departments. What are the facts in relation to that case? A gentleman from New York, [Mr. MANN,] on the 25th February, 1836, moved "that said bill be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary." My colleague [Mr. BELL] moved "it should be referred to a select committee;" and, pending these motions, a gentleman from Virginia [Mr. DROMGOOLE] moved "that the executive patronage bill be committed to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union," which motion took precedence of the others, and prevailed, and there the bill has slept ever since. The question of executive patronage was not taken up for consideration afterwards; and now the gentleman contends that the House having failed to act upon the subject, it was therefore against the bill, and in favor of executive patronage, to the fullest extent. Sir, during the last summer, in Tennessee, I endeavored to inculcate this doctrine, so far as to hold a majority of this House accountable for its failing to act upon this as well as some other important questions; but this doctrine was controverted by you and your friends. How would it hold upon another great question—the question of amending the constitution of the United States so as to secure the election of President and Vice President to the people, at all events and under all circumstances? For the last two sessions of Congress this has been a leading question, and afforded a fair opportunity for the party to show their zeal in carrying out the measures of General Jackson. I, and the friends with whom I act, have ever been in favor of that measure. At the session before the last, soon after it was known that Judge White was a candidate for the presidency, and while we were urging the House to take up the resolutions upon that subject, the present Speaker [Mr. JAMES K. POLK] made a speech, in which, after professing a willingness to go for the measure, objected to acting upon the subject then, alleging a want of time, and also some imperfection in the resolutions. I followed in a few remarks, in which I urged the importance of speedy action on the subject, and reminded the Speaker of his former course in relation to the matter; and, though he spoke against us, he voted with us to take up the resolutions. His friends, however, took their cue, and followed his precept instead of his example, and the resolutions were postponed. At the last session of Congress the same subject came up, with no better fate than before. It was with great difficulty we could get a report from the committee at all. They all professed to be in favor of the amendment. Oh! yes; but they seemed to agree to differ as to the mode of effecting it; and, at last, when the report came in, it took the same direction with the executive patronage bill, or something like it. We could not bring the gentlemen to a vote on either. And is it to be understood, now the election is over, (I know that it would not have been admitted before,) that all those who voted to give those important measures the go-by are to be set down as voting against them? If so, how do the party stand upon the great leading measures of General Jackson's administration? If we call upon gentlemen to walk in the footsteps of the President upon that oft-repeated but never heeded recommendation in regard to the election of President and Vice President, are we to be told that the House has already decided that question against the President's recommendations, by refusing to vote on the question? Are we to be told, if we propose to limit executive patronage, that the House has already decided that question in the same manner, and has sanctioned the full extent to which executive measures have been recently carried? And, sir, what is that extent? It is sufficient, if not checked, and grows into a settled precedent, to rivet chains upon us and our children forever. Such a precedent will authorize a President to make the nomination of his successor a cabinet measure, issue his proclamation calling a convention to confirm that nomination, and denounce, in advance, all who dare oppose the nominees before or after the convention acts, as "assailing public virtue, and opposing the right of the people to govern." For, sir, this has been done in the late nomination of the "Government" candidates, as they are called in the English journals. Was that ticket so remarkable for its purity and virtue that to oppose it was to assail the virtue of the people? Mr. Van Buren had promised to walk in the footsteps of General Jackson, and is, consequently, bound in due time to nominate his colleague (Colonel Johnson) for the presidency, order a convention to ratify his nomination, take the field, and secure his election by the use of all the ways and means in the power of the Executive. This, sir, is the extent to which executive patronage has already gone, and which the gentleman contends has beforehand been sanctioned by this House. This, sir, is what I deny. Whatever this House may be destined to do, it has not come to that yet.

Sir, I was not prepared for such doctrines, and I must say that I was not prepared for the opposition to the proposed investigation. I had hoped that gentlemen would have become ashamed of screening these officers, who, instead of running to General Jackson for certificates of moral character, should be the first to demand an investigation. But, sir, will the people of the United States be satisfied forever that they shall shrink from responsibility, hold up General Jackson's character as their shield, and thereby escape a scrutiny of their conduct? If they have acted honorably, we wish them to show it; if those suspicions, so common, so universal, are groundless, we wish the country to know it. Innocence never seeks for safety in flight, in concealment, but rather courts investigation and defies scrutiny. How can gentlemen reconcile innocence with this trembling and shrinking—this shielding themselves under the numerical strength of their friends in this House? This was their course at the last session of Congress. Remember, sir, what fatality attended every effort to obtain a committee of investigation then. Recollect the extraordinary and obnoxious protection extended to that darling Treasury-pet, Reuben Whitney. Let it also be remembered that the Committee on Indian Affairs unanimously recommended an inquiry into the abuses of that bureau, which would have developed the causes of the late and present Indian wars in the South. That committee reported a resolution authorizing any two of its members to prosecute the inquiry by taking testimony for the information of the House at this session. But, sir, this resolution, reported by a committee a majority of whom were in favor of Mr. Van Buren, was rejected in the House. The citizens of Georgia and Alabama petitioned and implored the House to investigate that subject, alleging the most unheard-of frauds and abuses. Upon this application the vote stood: Ayes 77, noes 77—a tie; and the Speaker gave the casting vote against the investigation. Sir, men high in favor and high in office were suspected. The agent of the Government, John B. Hogan, gave the Department official information of the greatest outrages practised upon the Indians which were ever perpetrated upon any people, savage or civilized. He was very soon removed, or rather promoted, from Indian agent to be collector at the port of Mobile. And yet, sir, we have no account of prosecutions, convictions, and punishments, which have followed his disclosures. Why, sir, those speculators, or rather Indian robbers, would find an old chief upon his patrimonial estate, where the chiefs and kings of his race had lived for centuries before him, with his slaves and his farm around him, smoking his pipe amidst his own forest trees, spurning any offer to purchase his home; and they would bribe some vagabond Indian to personate him in a trade to sell his land, forging his name; and the first intimation that he would have of the transaction would be his expulsion, by force, from his house! This was common; and not only so, but, under the pretext of reclaiming fugitive slaves, the wives and children (of mixed blood) of the Indians were seized and carried off in bondage. The famous Ocoila himself had his wife taken from him, and that, too, it has been said, by a Government officer, and was chained by the same officer to a log. Sir, what else could be expected but that these scourged, plundered, starving savages would glut their vengeance by the indiscriminate slaughter of the innocent and helpless families of the frontier, whose blood has cried to us in vain? This has caused the Florida war, which has produced such a waste of treasure, the loss of so much national and individual honor, and of so many valuable lives! This has called the gallant volunteers from my own State, and from my own district, who have traversed a thousand miles to fight the battle of strangers; to contend with a savage foe, while drinking those stagnant waters, whose malaria is death, many of whom are left in the wild woods of Florida, where "the foe and the stranger will tread o'er their heads," while their fellow-soldiers are far away, happy at home with their friends and families. One—ah! sir, any one of those noble youths, who now sleep under a foreign sod, was worth more than the whole army of plunderers who have caused the mischief. And yet, sir, such men as these were shielded at the last session of Congress by the casting vote of the Speaker. And now, according to the argument of the gentleman from Rhode Island, the House has sanctioned all they did.

I think, sir, it is time for this course of things to cease. It is time for the people to know something of the conduct of those in whose hands the public business is intrusted, and who really administer the Government. They have been behind General Jackson long enough. I was present when Mr. Van Buren took his position there. It was a striking display of that paternal care which the President has extended over Mr. Van Buren. In the spring of 1834, the President, Mr. Van Buren, and a few other gentlemen, I amongst the number, rode out to the Washington course to witness a trial of speed, (an amusement of which I am very fond, and for which the President had not altogether lost his taste at that day.) It was a trial run between the celebrated Busiris and Emily. The horses were brought on the course; all was calm and quiet until the rider of Busiris mounted, when the old courser began to rear and plunge; this seemed to stir the mettle of Old Hickory; he reared upon his stirrups and took command: "Hold him," (said he to the boy,) "don't let him run against the fence." "You must break him of that, sir," (to the trainer,) "I could do it in an hour." Turning to me, he said: "Take your stand there," (pointing to a position on the side of the course;) "there is but one place from which a horse can be correctly timed." I took my station with lever in hand. "Now," said he, "come up, and give them a fair start." At this moment he discovered the Vice President, who had come up and taken his position near me; he exclaimed with great emphasis and earnestness of manner, as he flashed his eye from the excited animals to the Vice President, "Mr. Van Buren, get behind me; they will run over you, sir." It would have done you good to see how natural and easy it was for Van to slope off behind the old chief. And, sir, there he has been ever since. Old Hickory would not get out of the way for us to run over him; if he had given us a fair chance, on any stretch or turn during the whole race, we would have run over him, or made him fly the track. But, sir, we have got him on the repeat; the General will be out of the way; he is no game-horse, and we will make a case of him on the repeat. I do not complain so much that the President has fallen in love with Mr. Van Buren, but I claim the privilege of falling in love with whom I please; and this, sir, is the last privilege which will ever be surrendered by man, or woman either. But, sir, Mr. Van Buren is in love with the President, too; and he accidentally found it out. The manner of this discovery is somewhat curious. I do not know this to be true, but it was much talked of and universally believed in this city. Mr. Van Buren was in conversation with a lady, an intimate friend of the President, amiable, interesting, and remarkable for communicating to him whatever she thought would be agreeable for him to hear. Mr. Van Buren said to this lady "that he had been reading much, and thinking deeply, of late, upon the characters of great men, and had come to the conclusion that General Jackson was the greatest man that had ever lived in the tide of time; that he was the only man among them all who was without a fault." The fair friend of the President was delighted. "But," said he, "whatever you do, don't tell General Jackson what I have said. I would not have him to know it for the world." You see, sir, that he was afraid she might forget it, and therefore thought it safest to jog her memory. But, sir, he might have saved himself that trouble, for the excellent lady flew to the President, and told him all that had passed. "Ah! madam," said he, with tears in his eyes, "that man loves me; he tries to conceal it, but there is always some way fixed by which I can tell my friends from my enemies." Now, sir, Van was like the Frenchman, (though I want it distinctly understood that I differ with him about this, as well as about many other things.) A Frenchman began to write his deed thus: "Know one woman by these presents." "Why," said the other party, "do you not put it, know all men by these presents?" "Vell," said he, "is it not de same ting? If vone woman know it, will not all de mens find it out?"

When Mr. PEXTON had concluded,

Mr. GLASCOCK said he should, in the first place, vote to sustain the resolution of the gentleman from Rhode Island; and, if the House should not adopt it, he would then vote for that of the gentleman from Virginia. It was, however, due to the administration, and due to those distinguished gentlemen who had filled the head executive offices in this Government, that the charges against them should be specifically made, and not on vague rumor. At the same time he was willing that both the gentlemen from Virginia and Tennessee should be named members of the committee, and have an opportunity of examining every document, and exploring all the archives, and ransacking every recess for information, if they had any suspicion of frauds. Mr. G. then went on at some length in reply to the remarks of the gentleman from Tennessee, which were uncalled for, especially at this time, so far as the President was concerned, from any thing contained in the brief passage quoted from the message. He said he knew that the President desired investigation. Mr. G. was authorized to say that it was the President's own desire that, before his term of service should expire, a strict investigation should take place into all the different departments, and that all matters therewith connected should be inquired into.

Mr. RIPLEY addressed the Chair as follows:

Mr. Speaker: Had this been a proposition to inquire into the condition of the Department of State, of the Treasury, of the Navy and War Departments, and the General Post Office, with a view to investigate abuses, if they exist, no person would be more willing to join in the inquiry than myself. No individual would be more anxious to enforce the responsibility of subordinate officers. There are none who will go farther to ferret out any malepractices; and, if they really exist, to punish them with the high constitutional power of this House. Had the resolution for inquiry had these objects solely and honestly in view, I should have been the last to oppose it. But, sir, the President is constitutionally responsible for the whole of the executive department; the various radii of its powers concentrate as well its responsibilities as its honors upon him; and when I take these circumstances into view, and consider also the spirit in which this debate has been conducted, the position of the President cannot be observed without exciting our share of sympathy. Shall we, at a moment when his connexion with the people of the United States is about to terminate forever, and all the aspirations of ambition are to be dissolved by age, infirmities, and sickness; when the consciousness of his high and devoted services, which we all know he must possess, and the enthusiastic affection of the American people, were about to cheer the evening of his life, and to gild his expiring lamp, is it right or proper for the representatives of the people whom he has succored and saved to cut off this departing solace, and to imbitter his last days, by adopting a resolution which, if adopted, will sanction an opinion of this House, that corruption and Andrew Jackson have been coupled together? Will they do this without some specific charge, without some definite allegation, sustained at least by the endorsement of one individual in the House, who will be willing to give his name to posterity as the author of the allegation. In the speech of the honorable member from Tennessee, marked with so much wit and pungency of satire, the allegations are made against Andrew Jackson, as the object who is to be convicted of the corruption which is so broadly insinuated in the resolution to exist in the executive department. I am not willing to exercise the high constitutional powers of this House, in the least degree, in sanctioning such an allegation.

General Jackson, after a life spent in the service of his country, is about retiring from the elevated position he holds as presiding executive officer of these States, at an advanced age, and worn down by the labors spent in that service. He is now, sir, on the bed of sickness, which may prove his bed of death. God grant that it may not, but that he may live many, many years amongst that people whose rights he has so bravely and honestly defended, and whose prosperity under his successful administration has excited the astonishment of the whole civilized world.

What, sir, is the relation that Andrew Jackson bears to the representatives of the people of the United States? From the period of your revolutionary war to the present moment, he has been the lofty, indefatigable defender of his country. In war and in peace, on the battle field and in your councils, his exertions, his toils, and unceasing energy and integrity, have done as much as any other man, not excepting your Washington in the field, and your Jefferson and Madison in the cabinet, to elevate the character of this republic, to advance its prosperity, and to preserve its peace. His name has been a tower of strength, and under his administration the character of an American citizen, as was that formerly of a Roman citizen, is a passport throughout the world. Ay, sir, in foreign lands, wherever your star-spangled banner displays, from the high and giddy mast, the character of our republic, under the ægis of the lofty virtues of the President, has that wall of strength that feels ever conscious of the protection of a great and powerful nation. And would you, sir, would this House, after a life thus spent, and which impartial history is about to take charge of for the benefit of his country; would they at the eve of his long life, so worthily spent in all that is patriotic and virtuous in the public service; would they pursue him with insinuations that corruption, with its blighting mildew, had found entrance into the bosom of Jackson's more than Roman virtue? If this House institutes the inquiry, it sanctions the charge; and will they, without any specific allegations, just at the close of General Jackson's career, hold the fatal chalice to his lips, which should poison and imbitter with the stings of ingratitude the evening of his life? We have had no precedent to justify such a measure. Party spirit has raged and misrepresented all our Presidents during their term of office; but they have passed and are passing off the stage, all with the award of official and personal integrity. Some have not been re-elected by the people, but against them no charge of corruption is found imbedded in the annals of the country. Nor does any American citizen, at even this lapse of time, impeach their integrity; no one charges them with wilful or wanton corruption, while administering the affairs of the Commonwealth. The only allegations made against them, as they quit the scene of their labors, of their glories, and their services, were, that a distinguished member, formerly from Virginia, accused Mr. Jefferson of retiring with a political falsehood in his mouth; and an equally distinguished member from Massachusetts moved his solitary vote to impeach Mr. Madison. I have no doubt, sir, after the excitement of party was over, both of these gentlemen regretted these allegations. The charges never have and never will affect the great patriarch of liberty, the author of the declaration of independence, or his equally illustrious friend, the founder and champion of our constitution. The one unfurled to the world the principles of popular government; the other, more than any man, connected liberty with law—secured an equality of political rights, by securing to society the fruits of labor. Wherever oppressed man rises to resist the oppressor, the declaration drawn up by Thomas Jefferson is invoked. Wherever constitutional law is appealed to, to secure those rights, the political writings of James Madison form the pure fountains of living water which diffuse liberty and tranquillity amongst the nations. Together, locked hand in hand, they are working their silent way, and they have planted that school of political liberty, of which this republic may arrogate to itself, through their exertions, the being the founder.

Republics have been accused of being ungrateful. Aristides was ostracised for being called the Just, and Themistocles banished, after saving his country from desolation. The authors of these acts have not transmitted their names to posterity. How keen would be the reproaches of the history of the last two thousand years, how withering their infamy, if they had not escaped by this silence of history. General Jackson has been doomed to meet the same ingratitude, after preventing the dismemberment of our republic, after rescuing the fair and fertile fields of the State which I have the honor to represent. There, sir, helpless age and tender youth, and all the charms of refinement and beauty, were protected by his hand. There, sir, was effected one of those signal deliverances of a people which has already caused the plains of New Orleans to rank with Marathon and Plataea, reflecting all its bright lustre upon the army of liberty that fought under him, and sending all its glowing light throughout the world, to elevate the character of this republic. Sir, almost at the moment this was effecting, and while painting, history, poetry, music, and sculpture, were giving greenness to his immortality, the Senate of the United States were denouncing him in the Seminole war. Sickening with the same feelings that were pained at hearing Aristides called the Just, the detractors of Andrew Jackson loathed the beau ideal of his character. Again, during the panic, that same body have impeached and condemned him, without a trial, for an alleged violation of the constitution of the United States. How, sir, have the people met these charges? They have almost by acclamation elected him President on each occasion. They have rallied to defend him. Where, sir, are his accusers? I ask again, where are they? And, sir, permit me to predict that if the present resolution passes, it will only reflect disgrace upon the present House of Representatives. The people will come to the rescue, and expunge the resolution from this House, as I trust they are about expunging a former one from the Senate. The whole future history of the country will hold up in proud relief their old chief, sans peur and sans reproche, and the ingratitude of this House in pursuing him with the odious charge of corruption, even upon the bed of sickness and of death, when I do not believe there can be a member here who conscientiously believes that Andrew Jackson ever was, in thought, word, or deed, unfaithful or inimical to the interests of this country.

I regret that the honorable member from Tennessee should have been so excited by a warm election contest as to urge, upon such trivial grounds as he has alleged, so grave an inquiry into the corrupt conduct of the executive departments. The State of Tennessee has been reared under the fostering and paternal care of Andrew Jackson. He has done more than any other man to elevate and form its character. Intelligent, chivalric, patriotic, and virtuous, they will be the last portion of the people of the United States to sanction allegations, either personal or as the constitutional head of the Government, against their veteran chief. Those brave men who followed his banner through the Creek nation, and on the plains of New Orleans, with the citizen soldiers of Kentucky, Mississippi, and Louisiana, are not to prove so recreant to Andrew Jackson, and so unfaithful to themselves, as to imbitter the remnant of his days with so unjust an accusation. And what are all the allegations that the honorable member adduces to justify the exercise of the high constitutional power of this House? That the President, in a conversation with a friend, had remarked that Mr. Bell, another member from Tennessee, had stated lies about him, and that "Peyton could tell twenty lies to Bell's one." Now, sir, what were the facts in the case? The honorable members from Tennessee at the last session had indulged in pretty severe censures upon the President's administration. In conversation with his neighbors, according to this statement, in naturally vindicating himself, he had pretty warmly recriminated. I think the language that he made use of, as is usual on such occasions, must have undergone, in the course of its gossip, some version before it reached ears of the honorable member; for it is not the language of that delicate and manly bearing which all know mark the character of Andrew Jackson. At any rate, is a mere controversy in an election, where the President and the honorable members from Tennessee, in the exercise of their constitutional rights, supported different candidates, to be the basis of an inquisitorial examination, on the part of this House, into the conduct of the executive departments?

Again: the honorable member alleges that this House refused to institute an inquiry into frauds that were perpetrated upon the Indians of Alabama, by the citizens of that State, in the sales of their lands to individuals. When that resolution was introduced into the House, I had the honor of proposing an amendment to it, referring the subject to the President of the United States. The motive for this amendment was, that this House had no constitutional power to order the investigation by their authority; and, if it had been done, it would have been one of the most fatal precedents to the rights of the States. It was alleged that the Indians had been swindled out of their reserved lands, in many cases, by residents of Georgia and Alabama. Of course, if offences had been committed, as I know of no law of the United States providing for such cases, they were common law or statute law offences against those States, not cognizable by the United States tribunal. In a case where the State of Alabama secures a speedy trial by jury, and a cross-examination of witnesses, would any person arrogate to this House the power to send its committee to make an ex parte investigation, to hold up its citizens as malefactors, without being heard, without the privilege of counsel, and the cross-examining of witnesses? Suppose, sir, that, in obtaining the charter of a bank in a neighboring State, respectable citizens should be accused of fraud and bribery, an offence that is punishable by the common law of that State, does this House, sir, possess the power to trample upon State rights, and send its committee of inquisition into the halls of the State Legislature, to hunt up ex parte testimony as its basis, and to hunt down all that is respectable and venerable in the character of its citizens, to condemn them unheard, without grand juries or petit juries, and draw up a withering report, that would blast them as far as our language extended, before they had an opportunity of defending themselves? If this power had been exercised by the original resolutions of last session, like the Council of Ten at Venice, or the Holy Inquisition of Spain, it would have sung the requiem of public liberty, and broken down the whole penal jurisdiction of the independent States. And I feel peculiar personal consolation in being the means of arresting the progress of a measure so fraught with disastrous consequences. The subject was referred to the President, who was directed to investigate into the cases of fraud. From the character of the agent employed by the President, (General Hogan,) I feel confident, from my knowledge of the man, that the duty has been faithfully attended to; and if, as the honorable member suggests, he has received the collectorship of Mobile, it cannot have been conferred upon a more deserving or more intelligent citizen, or one who has more gallantly defended his country during the gloomiest period of the late war.*

The honorable member has also referred to the Secretary of the Treasury as being embraced in the general allegation of corruption. Sir, the lofty character of Levi Woodbury is too well known to this House and to this nation to require any comment from me. Born, reared, and educated, amidst the granite mountains of my native State, his stern and sterling virtues had already carried him to the highest honors of New Hampshire, when, in the midst of the panic battle, he was called to the arduous duties of the Treasury of the United States. New England may justly feel proud of the high character which he has reflected back upon his native land. And let me ask, what inducement to corruption can there be on the part of Levi Woodbury? There has been no specific charge against him; not a whisper of prejudice that he has done any thing to forfeit his exalted character. He is affluent in his personal situation, with every thing to make him happy in domestic life; and, above all, principles of the most stern and unbending integrity are interwoven with his nature. The only allegation insinuated against him is, that in the exercise of his duty, imposed by a law passed by this House, he is compelled to transact official business with the agent of the deposit banks. That agent is no officer of this Government; we have no constitutional power over him. He has been assailed by the severest epithets of party. He has been employed by the deposit banks, many of them in opposition to the administration, to attend to their business with the Treasury. For my own part, I do not learn any specific charges with which he is accused. And I have no doubt that the President, when he gave him the character which the honorable member states that he did at Jonesborough, came to the honest and conscientious conviction that such a torrent of anathemas from the opposition in this House, assailing the character of this man for more than four years, would have annihilated him had not his reputation been founded upon the rock of integrity. High-sounding epithets and bold denunciations cannot, thank God, blast the character of any American citizen, unless they are accompanied with specific allegations and specific proofs. On the contrary, they raise in the generous minds of the American people that spirit of sympathy for unmerited persecution which is sure to protect its intended victim, and roll back the current upon the author.

I feel, sir, that I should have but unworthily discharged my duty as a Representative of Louisiana, had I not raised my voice in opposition to this resolution. Whatever may be the personal or political predilections of my constituents, gratitude to Andrew Jackson for the inestimable benefits he has conferred upon the citizens of our State is an almost pervading sentiment. It is, like the vestal flame, guarded with intense care, and faithfully transmitted from one generation to another. As the 8th of January revolves its annual rounds, so often does the hoary veteran who shared in the memorable campaign repair to the grass-grown hillock which marks the battle field, and recite the eventful story to his children. Often are time and space annihilated, and the years of his pilgrimage recalled to the desperate conflict; and in those rural fetes, which none knows better how to grace with refinement and beauty than the gallant Frank of our sunny clime, the revered name of Andrew Jackson is never forgotten, and the choicest of Heaven's blessings are invoked upon the patriot's head.

Mr. PEYTON rose and said:

Mr. Speaker: The gentleman from Louisiana has charged me with assailing the President's measures, and to that cause he ascribes the excited state of feeling under which he spoke while in Tennessee. My opposition to the measures of the President! I defy that gentleman to point to one of the great measures of General Jackson's administration which I had not supported, unless he claims the election of Mr. Van Buren as one of those measures. If so, I did oppose that measure, and will ever be found in opposition to such an executive measure. But, sir, has any man the boldness, the hardihood, whatever may have been his motives of action, to avow such a doctrine upon this floor? The gentleman speaks of Tennessee in connexion with "the ingratitude of republics," and expresses a "hope that the people of that State will yet learn to appreciate the character and services of General Jackson." This charge against Tennessee, of ingratitude to the President, is not original with the gentleman, [General Ripley.] It has been adopted by him from the lowest source—it issued from the dark caverns of the Globe. What, sir! the people of Tennessee learn to appreciate the character and services of Andrew Jackson! Look at his history—when he first crossed the Alleghanies, a beardless stranger, with his knapsack upon his back, his rifle on his shoulder; no power, no patronage then, sir, with nothing to recommend him to our pioneer fathers but a congenial spirit. How did they receive him? With open arms they took him to their bosoms. They conferred upon him all the honors, all the offices known to their laws and constitution. And, sir, their sons have stood by him in every crisis, in every peril of his subsequent life. Look back, sir, upon the highway of his fame, and you will find the bones of a Tennessean mouldering upon every field of his glory. And the gentleman hopes that Tennessee will learn to appreciate his character! It is true, sir, that in the late presidential election Tennessee early took her stand. She planted herself upon those principles for which she had battled by the side of General Jackson; and there she proudly stands yet, firm, fixed, and immovable. She was not to be driven from the ballot-box. She could not, she dare not, yield her principles, and surrender up her liberty, at the command of any man. But, sir, I wish to set the gentleman right upon another point. He contends that the House, in adopting this resolution, will do General Jackson injustice; that we who advocate it have already done him great injustice. Is it in this manner that every inquiry, every investigation, is to be strangled in its infancy, under the pretext of inflicting injury upon General Jackson? Why, sir, we have to legislate upon this subject under the terrors of "expunge." Yes, sir, the gentleman has announced to the House that if this resolution is passed it will be expunged. The Lord save me from an expunging House, as well as an expunging Senate. I have witnessed, with loathing and disgust, the operation of that process in the Senate. I have seen the great expunger, [Colonel Bexton,] in the grim majesty of his expunging power, lashing, with the whip of scorpions, abler and honest men than himself to the work; flogging them on to make war upon the constitution of their country and the journals of the Senate; and I have shuddered when I saw it. But I saw, sir, last winter, a disposition manifested by the party, I am sure I did by some of its leaders, to encourage him in his mad scheme of wasting the surplus revenue, that he might batter out his brains against the walls of his own fortification system, and thereby save them the trouble of knocking him on the head. Sir, he will never rise, under the weight of that stone and mortar, from the mud and quicksands into which they have plunged him. Sir, I hope never to see this House scourged by so rude and barbarous a despotism. I hope that Heaven has for us in store a better fate. "Expunge," sir! expunge what? We propose to look into the conduct of your "hirelings"—to examine the dark deeds of your Whitneys and your Kendalls, and have "expunge" flung in our faces. But are we, the representatives of the American people, to falter in our duty, and cower under the iron sceptre of some expunging hero who is to rise up amongst us? And, sir, if we but touch one little twig of this great Jackson tree, which overshadows the land, and stretches its branches throughout the continent, we are charged with an assault upon its trunk, and expunge is instantly proclaimed. No, sir; we wish to brush off these sap suckers, who have been drawing from that body its vitality. We have to approach them as boys kill woodcocks, by whipping round Old Hickory; and I have always advised the mildest measures, the use of limber switches, so as not to hurt him. There was something in the gentleman's manner, and the tenor of his remarks, which seemed to appeal from me to the people of Tennessee, and to threaten me with their displeasure. Sir, the boldest representative upon this floor is far behind the spirit of that people in their unshaken purpose of asserting their rights and maintaining their freedom. A cruel war has been waged against Tennessee, but she has met the crisis as became her character; she has met the mercenary legions unawed; she may be crushed, but not conquered; she may fall, but if she does, it will be at the shrine of the constitution, in the grave of public liberty. And, sir, I will go down with her; I would not survive her fate. I am willing to go home and meet my people; I have nothing to fear from them; their kindness and partiality towards me have always been far beyond my merits. But, sir, the injustice done to General Jackson by supporting this measure; what is it? We demand an investigation into the agency of Reuben Whitney; we ask for an inquiry into the condition of the Treasury. We require that there shall be a full investigation into all the departments, and into the conduct of the whole army of public officers, who have been engaged in this business of the succession—this trampling under foot of laws and constitutions. We wish to know from whence came this money. Where is the source of their corruption? Where is the mint from which they can send their hireling editors through the country, poisoning the fountains of intelligence amongst the people? How is it that our army in Florida has been neglected, and left to suffer for want of supplies, while it was within a few days' sail of New Orleans? Men starving, horses sinking under them in the swamps—all, all, sir, in consequence of gross and criminal neglect somewhere. Was it that our high functionaries were too busily engaged to think of the army—too full of Mr. Van Buren to cast a thought on Ocoola—too busily engaged in electioneering to think of the gallant men who were fighting the battles of their country? It is in behalf of men whose conduct has been such as this that the message volunteers a laudatory certificate. Sir, I deny the authenticity of this message. General Jackson never gave that certificate. They have written it themselves, and obtained the signature of his name. And yet, with such a testimonial in their favor, they shrink from the proof—they shrink from inquiry. Let us have the proof, sir, and then we will see whether they are honest or venal, corrupt or immaculate. Sir, I do not say they are corrupt; that is just what I wish to find out. I want a strict and impartial investigation. It is lawful, it is usual, to make such inquiries. It is surely right to investigate our own affairs—to examine into the deeds of our own agents. This is our right, it is our duty, and cannot do "injustice" to any one. I protest against the issue which the gentleman from Louisiana has joined. It is not a question between General Jackson and this House; his person and conduct is one thing, and the persons and conduct of these officers is another. I hope that no attempt to crush this investigation on such an issue will succeed; and, sir, let us hope that no American Congress will ever be found ready to expunge an order directing an investigation into the departments. No, sir; this will never be the case, so long as a shadow of our liberties remains.

Mr. A. MANN said that, of all the debates to which he had ever listened, this was the most useless. The cry of corruption had been raised against the heads of these departments for two or three years, without there ever having been any specific charge of corruption or maladministration. He, for one, should be well pleased to see the accuser come face to face with the accused. If there was corruption any where, let it come out. But these general charges were made to extend to every nook and corner of our Government. Why was this? The cry of corruption was raised, but why did not the gentlemen show the act and point to the man who was guilty of it? Who was he in whom corruption had been found? He (Mr. M.) would assert, on behalf of the executive departments of this administration, that their officers courted investigation, and were desirous that your committees should be sent amongst them. He was in favor of investigation, but the resolution of the gentleman from Virginia contained merely general charges of corruption. He was in favor of Mr. PEARCE'S amendment, and would give power to a committee to investigate any specific charge which any member might make on this floor, or which any individual of a respectable character might make elsewhere. But let the investigation of the committee be confined to the particular charge which might be made. If there was corruption, let it be made known; if not, let not gentlemen be convicted upon mere general charges, having no proof to sustain them.

In reply to a question from Mr. UNDERWOOD,

Mr. MANN explained, that he did not say that he should vote against the original resolution, if the amendment be not adopted, but that he preferred the latter.

Mr. UNDERWOOD said that the remarks first made by the gentleman from New York [Mr. MANN] had afforded him a great deal of pleasure, for it seemed from them that the gentleman was in favor of the fullest and most thorough examination of the departments which could be made; and it also seemed that the heads of the departments, conscious of having discharged their duty, courted investigation, because they knew it would result to their credit, and confirm their claim to public confidence. But, sir, (said Mr. U.,) the concluding remarks of the gentleman from New York, in which he preferred the amendment offered by the member from Rhode Island to the original resolution, appeared to me inconsistent with those declarations, favorable to that full and latitudinous investigation, which were made in the first part of his speech. What, I ask, is the difference between the original resolution, adopted by the Committee of the Whole, and the proposed amendment? The original allows an unrestricted examination; the amendment would confine it to specified charges, to be made before the examination is commenced. The committee will not be tied down to any particular charge, or to any narrow course of inquiry, by the original resolution. This would be to permit that full and untrammelled examination which could not fail to expose the hidden things of darkness and corruption, if the departments are guilty, and to which I thought the member from New York had fully assented.

[Here Mr. MANN asked leave to explain, and said that he was in favor of a full and thorough examination; but his objection consisted in the generality of the investigation without specifications; a course which seemed to him too much like a general search warrant, and therefore inconsistent with sound constitutional principles; and he hoped the gentleman from Kentucky would take his idea.]

I think (said Mr. UNDERWOOD) I comprehend the gentleman from New York, and will not pervert his meaning. If we were in pursuit of stolen goods, and desired to search for them, the gentleman's idea is correct. We should then be bound to specify the article lost, and the place where we expected to find it; and, before subjecting a citizen to the humiliating process of having his private apartments searched, the constitutions of the United States and State of Kentucky, and probably of every other State in this Union, would require an oath or affirmation in support of the facts before the magistrate issues the warrant, and then the warrant should specify the place to be searched and the thing to be taken. But, sir, who ever heard these well-settled constitutional principles, until now, applied to political investigations, to the examination of the departments of this or any other Government? Has it come to this: that, when we ask for the appointment of a committee to ascertain whether our affairs have been properly managed and conducted by the servants of the people, gentlemen consider the proceeding analogous to the pursuit of thieves and stolen property, and contend that we ought to proceed with the same caution and formality? Sir, such a suggestion can result from nothing less than inconsiderate zeal in support of men who may be pure, and who ought to court, rather than shun, investigation, if their conduct fears no scrutiny. The idea that there is something wrong in a general commission or warrant to search and examine the political movements and official conduct of the departments of this Government seems to me totally at variance with the genius of all our institutions. What are the departments of this Government? Nothing but executive trusts, confided to agents, to be exercised according to the will and for the benefit of the people. The trustee or agent is amenable and responsible to the people; and how can that responsibility be enforced unless the people, whenever they choose, and at all times, can look into and examine as they please the records and official acts of every public functionary? And how, sir, can the people do this, unless it be through their Representatives on this floor? I demand it as a right, in the name of my constituents; and in their behalf I call for the practical exercise of that right, which will enable a committee of this House to lay before them the official correspondence of every Secretary, the condition of their offices, and the whole evidences of their official conduct, whether it be good or whether it be evil.

If such an examination be not legitimate, if we have no such power, then indeed are the officers of Government placed above the reach of the people, and from nominal servants have become practical masters. The ample investigation tolerated by the gentleman from New York is coupled with the condition that we shall first charge some specific offence, and then he would allow us to examine the records, without restriction, for evidence in support of it. Now, sir, such a proceeding would be well calculated to turn the investigation into ridicule. It would be necessary, if that be the appropriate course, to form charges and specifications by guessing; and unless we happened to guess right, the whole investigation would amount to nothing; for I suppose no one will contend that conviction under impeachment, or public condemnation, would be the result, where the prosecutors had wholly mistaken the nature and character of the offence, and had exhibited charges totally variant from those sustained by the proof. Sir, I am not disposed to commence the investigation by guessing; but I am truly anxious to have an inspection of all the records of the several departments, for the purpose of ascertaining whether there has been any misfeasance or malfeasance committed. If any can be found, then it is time to bring forward the accusation. If none exist, then an honest committee should proclaim to the nation that all is well; and those who, from ill-founded suspicions, have insisted upon the investigation, would feel the blush of shame for having done injustice, in their thoughts, to the virtuous patriots who, uninfluenced by selfish and corrupt motives, have only labored to promote the great interests of the country.

The true question is, whether we have a right to make the examination before charging any offence; or must we specify offences at random, and then call for a committee to ascertain their truth? If it was a mere copartnership between the heads of the departments and the representatives of the people, we should have the right to inspect their books and papers; and a refusal on their part to let us do it would be just cause for dissolving the concern. But, sir, it is not a copartnership in political trade, where each member of the firm shares the profits according to the capital of intrigue and management he contributes. Such a doctrine is only current with those whose motto is, "to the victors belong the spoils." The people of this nation, in whose place we stand, do not admit the existence of any partnership with their rulers. It is no joint-stock company. Those who rule in the executive departments are the mere agents of the people, the trustees for their use; and we, temporarily clothed with the power of the people, as their representatives, have the same right to call upon those agents and trustees to exhibit all their books, records, and accounts, touching the affairs of the Government, that the merchant has to call upon his factor, or the landlord upon his steward. Sir, this right is the true basis of American liberty; it is the essence of responsibility; and if it be not practically exercised, the people can never settle their accounts, or know how they stand with their rulers; and when the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. REXEY] seemed to deny the very existence of such a right, I felt that he was uttering sentiments and opinions more congenial to the monarchical atmosphere of Europe than the republican expanse which encircles the States of this Union. If there is no such right, liberty is dead, and despotism reigns.

But, sir, the abstract right has not been positively denied, although it has been treated as if it did not exist; and the manner proposed for its exercise, by the amendment of the gentleman from Rhode Island, rather implies a want of right or authority to send out a committee to make a general examination. The gentleman from Rhode Island is an astute lawyer; and, if he will reflect a moment, he must be sensible that the course indicated by his amendment is a departure from the settled practice in courts of justice, designed to bring the violators of the penal code to punishment. By their practice, the grand jury is first empanelled and sworn to inquire; and, sir, the grand jury is unrestricted in its inquiries. It has no limits, but may take a range of investigation coextensive with the penal laws of the land. The grand jury indicts and presents, and gives shape and form to the charge. After the grand jury has specified the time, place, circumstances, and manner of the crime, then comes the venire, and the accused is put upon his trial. The gentleman's amendment reverses the order of things. He would have the prosecutor to state the charge by guessing, and without the examination of any witness before the grand jury, or a court of inquiry, and then he would forthwith enter upon the trial. Only indulge the gentleman in such a course—a course which subverts the settled wisdom of the country, growing out of the experience of ages—and I will venture to say that no culprit ever could be convicted, with the gentleman's talents employed in the defence. This House is the grand inquest of this nation, and I, for one, Mr. Speaker, will never consent to trammel its investigations by adopting a limited rule, such as the amendment proposes.

The gentleman from Louisiana, [Mr. RIFLEY] seems to consider the original resolution, which contemplates an examination of the departments in all their ramifications, as an insinuation against the integrity of the President. He [Mr. R.] will not look into the condition of the departments, because the President has certified that all is well; and to look for himself and his constituents after that would be to suspect the truth and honesty of the President.

I was astonished to hear such sentiments avowed on this floor. They are, in my opinion, exotic, plants which should never be permitted to take root in American soil. It is the doctrine of passive obedience, of quiet acquiescence in the will of a master. Sir, the gentleman forgets that eternal vigilance is the condition upon which public liberty depends. We should receive nothing without examination, without sifting it thoroughly, and ascertaining for ourselves and our constituents all its properties and qualities. If we are to take things on trust, our presence here might as well be dispensed with, and we had better surrender at once all the powers of government into the hands of a truthful and honest President. Sir, I have nothing to do with the truth or honesty of the President. I shall neither concede nor deny him these qualities upon this occasion. By his "fruits" I know him. But as he is soon to retire from his station, and as it does not affect the principles for which I am contending, whether he is truthful and honest or otherwise, I shall not stop to inquire into such personal qualities. But suppose it were conceded that his character for truth and honesty stands as high as his warmest admirers would place it, are we to abstain from an examination into the conduct of our public functionaries, and the situation of their offices, merely because the President is of opinion they have done their duty? The President's certificate in their behalf is nothing more than his opinion; he does not inform us that he has made a minute and personal examination into the condition of the departments, and that his opinion is the result of such examination. We know that the President's official duties have required a great deal of his time. His absence last summer, and his recent illness, connected with his official engagements, have allowed him very little time to devote to the examination of the departments; and hence, sir, this House and this nation may form a very different opinion in regard to the heads of the departments and their conduct, from that expressed by the President; and all this may be done without assailing his personal character.

The gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. PEABODY] seemed to oppose the proposed investigation, because he apprehended there was a lurking purpose to depreciate, if not slander, the characters of those who are at the head of the executive departments. I am equally sensible, with that gentleman, of the value to this nation of the reputation of our public men, and I have had cause to regret the unmerited reproaches and vile calumnies which are often cast upon them by a corrupt partisan press; but I cannot perceive any good reason for opposing the original resolution, lest the characters of those high in office might suffer by its adoption. We must take it for granted that the committee will report nothing but facts. If the facts are of such a nature as to produce censure, degradation of character, and expulsion from office, it will be much more creditable to the nation and its institutions to expose the base motives and bad acts of exalted functionaries, than to leave them unmolested in their high places, presenting a fair exterior to dupe the world, while all is disgusting filth and rottenness within. I admit there is a diminution of national character whenever any of our high officers are shown to be unworthy of their stations; but we had better lose in this respect than to wink at corruption for the sake of appearances. By detecting, exposing, and punishing political criminals, those who offend against the statutes and principles of liberty, there is a national gain of reputation, which more than counterbalances the loss I have mentioned. The gain consists in the manifestation of a sound state of moral and political sentiment, which will not allow offenders to escape with impunity; and the assurance, we find in the stern political virtue which condemns the official knave, that our free institutions are destined to last forever. Now, sir, let us test those principles of loss and gain, by instituting the fullest and most unlimited inquiry; and if the result is, as some predict, that the characters of our cabinet ministers will shine the brighter from having passed the ordeal, the nation will gain much by the conviction that existing suspicions are not well founded, and by the increase of the reputations of those high functionaries.

It has been said that the original resolution proposes a new thing, for which there is no precedent in the history of this Government. Grant it, and what of that? Is not the President's laudatory certificate in behalf of all the executive departments and their officers a new thing in the history of this Government? What former President ever did the like? If the President introduces a new practice, may we not meet it by an appropriate novelty? If the original resolution is amended, it should be done by providing for the appointment of a separate committee to examine each department. One committee, I fear, cannot go through the whole. If such a practice had prevailed, as I think it ought to have done, from the commencement of the Government, I have no doubt that many things which have been improperly done would not have taken place. Early impressions, Mr. Speaker, are never forgotten. The first lesson taught me, as a member of the Kentucky Legislature, many years since, was the propriety of appointing annually a committee to examine each department of the Government of that State, and to report upon its condition. The offices of our State—Auditor, Treasurer, Register, &c., are annually examined by a separate committee, and reported on. We do not take the Governor's word that all things are going on well; but the representatives of the people investigate for themselves and their constituents; and the same practice should prevail in this Government, henceforth and forever.

If, Mr. Speaker, I have satisfied the House that we possess the power to make a general examination into the condition of the departments, without stating beforehand any specific abuse or malfeasance as the object of inquiry; if such power necessarily results from the legislative powers vested in us by the constitution, and from the power of impeachment, then there is nothing left to be considered but the propriety of exercising the power at this time. It is nothing more nor less than an exercise of the right to examine a department when this House calls for a report. We have as much right to appoint a committee to ascertain a fact by inspecting the records of a department, as to require the head of the same department, or the chief of any bureau, to report as to the particular fact, upon his inspection. Suppose a question should arise whether the fact is truly reported, how can you decide unless you have the power to examine? I dismiss the argument in regard to the right of a general examination, and will proceed to show the propriety of its exercise.

H. of R.]

The President's Message.

[DEC. 15, 1836.]

Will it interest the people of this country, and of the whole civilized world, to know whether there are corrupt combinations existing among the officers of this Government, to aid and assist each other in procuring and retaining for themselves and their relatives offices and the emoluments thereof? Is it advisable to ascertain, in this the freest Government on earth, how far the spirit of despotism can or has obtained power to proscribe and punish those who dare to assert with boldness, and to maintain with independence, their principles of policy, and their opinions in regard to men? Will it have a salutary influence among the lovers of justice and votaries of freedom, to expose the wicked schemes of self-aggrandizement, which sometimes corrupt the wholesome administration of the laws, and infuse a deadly poison into the legislation of a country? If these questions are affirmatively answered, then, sir, we ought now to raise a committee and require an examination according to the original resolution. Whether the committee would find, by their investigation, facts to alarm the nation, or to cheer it on its forward march to greatness in population, in wealth, in resources, need not be anticipated. The committee would certainly find facts of the one kind or the other; and the investigation would necessarily result in pointing out dangers which threaten our destruction, or in confirming our hopes of the durability of our institutions. Either result is desirable, and hence we should not hesitate to adopt the original resolution.

I will suggest some things which could be done, and which could not fail to be deeply interesting to the public. Shortly after the election of General Jackson as President, the postmaster at Glasgow, Kentucky, was removed from office. He did not vote for General Jackson. A political partisan was appointed in his place. The removed postmaster had the business of the office conducted to the satisfaction of the people, so far as I am informed. During the last session, charges of malfeasance were forwarded to me against the then incumbent, so satisfactorily sustained by proof, that the Postmaster General removed the incumbent, and appointed another in his place. Now, sir, the documents by which the removal of the postmaster last session was accomplished are no doubt on file in the Post Office Department. The documents and charges upon which the first removal took place ought also to be there, and doubtless are. I would have an examining committee inspect these documents, and collect from them the principle of action with the Department, which, in the first instance, caused the removal of a competent and faithful officer, without any complaint against him, and the appointment of an individual, a political partisan, afterwards removed for malfeasance. A similar inquiry should be had in all other like cases. In the progress of the examination, I would also examine the correspondence and documents relative to the removal of the postmaster at Stanford, Kentucky, and the appointment of Alfred Hocker in his place! I presume the House are not ignorant of one act, at least, performed by this notorious personage; and every gentleman, no doubt, has heard that when he demanded possession of the books, papers, &c. of the office to which he had been appointed, the young man having charge of them refused to surrender upon the first summons; and upon a passionate inquiry from Hocker, as to his authority for withholding the papers, the youth calmly replied, "just the same which you had to withhold the Lincoln poll-book." Sir, I should like to know, I think it would be beneficial to this nation to ascertain, the motives and principles of one of the departments of this Government, which led to the appointment of a man to hold a highly important office, who, but for the constitutional provision against ex post facto laws, would, in all human probability, have been a penitentiary convict at the date of his appointment. I would have the committee examine and re-examine the recommendations and correspondence relative to the appointment of Hocker. [Here a gentleman near Mr. U. suggested, in an under tone, "that they were probably burnt up by the fire last night."] Mr. U. continued. I hope not, sir. When I reached the conflagration, that part of the building appropriated to the use of the General Post Office was so far uninjured as to admit free access to the interior of it without danger, and there was ample time to have secured all important papers. I trust, sir, there has been no destruction of any which relate to removals from and appointments to office. These papers, if thoroughly scrutinized, will, I apprehend, exhibit combinations of depravity which would startle a confiding, unsuspecting people, and call into active operation that vigilance, that perpetual vigilance, without which knavery is destined to triumph over honesty, and liberty to fall under the machinations of tyrants. Sir, I desire that the committee should examine all the correspondence in each of the departments relative to removals and appointments. I want to know whether the Jeffersonian rule, "Is he honest, is he capable; is he faithful to the constitution," governs the departments in making appointments; or whether this be the rule now practised on: "Is he a voter, how did he vote, and how many votes can he control in all future contests for power?" You may suppress this inquiry if you dare; but, sir, unless the American people have utterly lost that character which brought their fathers through the storms of the Revolution, they will ultimately bring to light the hidden secrets of all your departments.

There are other objects to which a committee of investigation could and should turn their attention. During the last session, a member from New York [Mr. Hunt] was placed at the head of a committee, raised by the order of this House, for the purpose of inquiring into the speculations made in the public lands by members of Congress, and the facilities afforded them for that purpose by the deposit banks. He was unable to go through with the investigation, and asked further time, which was refused. Now, sir, the committee appointed, if the original resolution is adopted, can ascertain a great many facts in regard to the public lands, and the speculations carried on in them, which may have a very important influence upon the deliberations and legislation of this House. They can ascertain at the Land Office the quantity of acres sold to each individual and company for the last two years, and when each sale was made. They can ascertain the names of the purchasers, and then they can ascertain what sums of money have been loaned to these purchasers by the deposit banks, and when the loans were made, provided the officers of these banks do not say to them, "that is none of your business." Thus, sir, a committee, by going properly to work, can obtain from the records of one department and the books of the deposit banks all the information necessary to elucidate the subject of inquiry confided to the committee of which the gentleman from New York [Mr. Hunt] was chairman; and, by so doing, avoid wounding the delicate sensibility and fastidious honor of certain witnesses, who might refuse to answer certain questions, if called to testify.

From the Land Office the committee might pass over to the Treasury, and ascertain how much gold and silver had been there deposited to pay for lands, and in whose favor Treasury certificates of deposit were issued, and the amount of each. Thus, sir, the whole operations of our land system, for the last two years, might be developed in a report, pregnant with useful facts, and leading to important consequences in our legislation.

I shall say nothing more, believing, as I do, that if the suggestions made are not sufficient to satisfy this House of the propriety of raising a committee, and vesting it with unrestricted powers to examine the departments, all else will fail to have the desired effect.

Mr. LANE rose and moved an adjournment, but gave way to

Mr. BRIGGS, who, on leave, submitted a resolution, giving the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads power to send for persons and papers, in investigating into the causes of the burning of the Post Office building. Mr. B. explained that the resolution was offered to supply a defect in the one adopted on the same subject that morning. The resolution was concurred in nem. dis.; and then

FRIDAY, DECEMBER 16.

PROPERTY LOST IN MILITARY SERVICE.

Mr. E. WHITTLESEY, by consent, submitted a motion that the House proceed to the consideration of bills on the private calendar.

Mr. W. said he did not wish to multiply words, but that the calendar was very long, and he was anxious to send the bills to the other House as fast as possible.

The motion was agreed to, and the House, on motion of Mr. W., resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, (Mr. HAYNES in the chair,) on the bills on the private calendar; and, on motion of Mr. W., the bill to provide for the payment for horses and other property lost or destroyed in the military service of the United States was referred to the same committee. And the committee having taken up the said bill,

Mr. HARDIN moved to amend the first section of the same by striking out the words "4th May, 1822," and inserting the words "8th June, 1812," (extending its provisions to that period;) which amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOLSEY further moved to amend the bill by extending its provisions to property impressed "in any State or Territory, in the existing war in Florida, or the late war with the Creek Indians."

After some debate, in which Messrs. E. WHITTLESEY, HOLSEY, HARDIN, and WHITE, participated, the amendment was rejected. And, no further amendment having been offered, the bill was laid aside, but was subsequently taken up again, the amendments concurred in, and the bill ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

Several other bills were then taken up in committee; among the rest, a bill for the relief of the representatives of

COLONEL ANTHONY W. WHITE.

A long debate took place on this bill, principally on a motion of Mr. H. ALLEN to strike out the provision allowing interest from July 4, 1780, to the present time, on a claim for advances alleged to have been made to troops during the revolutionary war.

Mr. SMITH said it could not be otherwise than highly disagreeable to the mind of any gentleman upon this floor to feel himself under the necessity of opposing any claim that has its origin in, or that has grown out of, services rendered to the country during the revolutionary struggle for its independence. A claim of that denomination commends itself at once to our patriotic feelings; and we all are predisposed, and should be predisposed, to regard it with favor. But, Mr. Chairman, in the payment of public money to satisfy the demands of private individuals upon the Government, it is absolutely indispensable that some general principle be adopted and adhered to, and that all claimants be treated in the same manner. It would be great injustice not to do this, and would, moreover, leave our legislation very much at loose ends. Sir, there must be something strikingly peculiar in the character of that claim which can be regarded by Government or by Congress as elevated above that high merit of being just and equitable in itself. And, sir, there must be something no less singularly striking and peculiar in the character of that claim which shall be understandingly paid by the Government, or allowed by Congress, without its being just and equitable in itself. For one, sir, I am disposed to have the Government pay promptly every claim that shall come up to the character of being just or equitable in itself, and I am unwilling to have any paid that fall below this standard; and all that are paid, I would have paid upon one and the same principle, and by one and the same general rule, be that as it may, unless a positive agreement between the claimant and the Government shall constitute any particular claim an exception from the generality of private claims. That different degrees of hardship and misfortune, as well as of benefits and advantages, to individual claimants, will enter into the constitution of their different claims, is to be expected from the very nature of human affairs. But that the Government should undertake to deal out justice more nicely or equally among claimants, by an attempt to pursue their claims through all the incidental shades of merit that may be thought to distinguish some that are allowed from others that are also allowed, and to favor some over others, appears to my mind entirely impolitic, and impracticable to be accomplished, and would be more productive of inequality and complaint than of equality, and satisfaction, in the distribution of the Government's allowances. Sir, I am constrained to oppose such a system, and to know but one rule of payment; and that is, to pay all demands alike that are found to be just against the Government, and to reject all alike that are not found to be of this character.

In relation to the principal or substantive part of the claim now pending before the committee, I have nothing to say. I have not myself had an opportunity of investigating its merits in this particular; but it seems to be conceded on all sides as just in itself; at least, from no quarter have I heard it objected to upon this floor. But, sir, it is to the allowance of interest for some forty or fifty years back that I do make a question, and am constrained to oppose my vote; and I ask the committee to look well to the effect of such allowance upon both the past, present, and future operations of this Government. Are gentlemen prepared to adopt a principle so momentous in its extent, retrospective and prospective, which has never yet been adopted by Congress, unless in some very few cases where it was unobserved, probably; and a principle which has been repeatedly, and I may say uniformly, repudiated by Congress, in the adjustment of claims? Where will it lead us, or where will it end? If, because this claim is just, interest is to be allowed upon that claim from its origin, then, to be just and consistent in our practice, interest should be allowed on every other claim found to be just; for justice can know no medium at which to stop in this particular. And, sir, it is not only all present claims, but all future claims, which shall be adjudged just against the Government, that should and must be so settled with interest; and this claim will be an undeniable precedent and authority for it. Nor shall we be permitted to stop here, if we would be consistent, and alike just to all. But all claims that have at any time heretofore been recognised and paid by the Government, without the allowance of interest upon them, will be as fairly and equitably entitled respectively to this same allowance of interest by the Government, as if the principal had never been paid, or as if they were yet to be adjusted. Are gentlemen prepared to go this extent, or to involve the Government in these burdensome but inevitable consequences of the rule proposed to be adopted by this bill? Sir, consider the enormous claims still pending, denominated the French claims prior to 1800, and some of which, to say the least, are as just, perhaps, as even the claim now pending, or are alleged to be so; and are gentlemen prepared to carry out this principle of allowing interest in reference to those claims, and will they do it? Why should a different rule apply to one just claim, and not be conceded to another? If a rule of adjustment be adopted and applied to a present claim, admitted to be just, why not say it shall apply to all future and all past claims also, admitted also to be just? Because a claim has been once settled by the Government, if the settlement did not embrace all that the claimant, upon fair principle, such as the Government is now about to be made to recognise, was entitled to, the Government surely cannot refuse to go back and do the injured party that justice now. How many thousand claims will thus be revived, and upon the basis about to be established in this bill? Will gentlemen but reflect upon the strong equitable character of claims heretofore adjusted by Government, but denied the allowance of interest? When a revenue or custom-house officer, or any officer of the Treasury Department, under a misconstruction of a provision of law, has exacted of a merchant an excess of duty upon articles imported by him, and absolutely brought into the Treasury money that such merchant was not bound to pay, Congress has invariably repaid the amount wrongfully exacted, but never a cent of interest upon it. When the property of a citizen has been seized and sold by the Government for the supposed violation of some law, perhaps of a revenue law, and, upon adjudication by the proper tribunals, the seizure and sale have been disallowed and demonstrated to have been wrongful, the property of such citizen, or the proceeds of it, have been invariably restored, upon a claim therefor, but not with interest, even though years may have been exhausted in the proceedings. Could more equitable cases be conceived for the application of the rule of interest than were such cases? But, sir, it has not been adopted, because the whole proceeding and delay incident thereto have in all cases been viewed as a misfortune, and not a wrong, and for which the Government ought not and cannot, upon principles of sound policy, be considered as the responsible party. The Government, in such cases, loses the property for which it was contending and was supposed to be entitled to, while the other party recovers it, but with a loss of the use of it while in dispute. In case of a claim in the nature of a debt, long delays are often incident to an allowance. This is a misfortune for which the Government is not, and ought not to be, considered as particularly responsible. It is unavoidable, from the nature of government. The claimant himself is a constituent part of the same Government, and shares, in common with his fellow-citizens under it, of the advantages and disadvantages flowing from it. If the rule of the Government is to pay the demands justly made upon it, as soon as they are respectively established and passed through the requisite forms instituted for the security of the Treasury of the Government, it is all that can be rightly demanded of it; and the delay incident to their adjustment is a misfortune that each claimant must bear for himself, and constitutes no foundation for an additional claim against the Government. This, sir, I repeat, has been and must continue to be, I think, the established and only politic rule to be observed by Congress. Any other will lead to confusion, partialities, and injustice. Any other rule would be unjust to the Government itself.

Colonel Anthony W. White.

Mr. Chairman, the claim now before us is an old claim, and its advocates allege that it is of the same denomination with those that were provided for by the funding system, of the revolutionary debts, adopted under President Washington's administration, upon which interest was allowed. If this be so, sir, it goes to establish the justice of the debt, but not the justice of the claim now set up for interest upon it. For the question arises at once, if provision was made by Government for the adjustment of this claim at that early period, why was not it adjusted, and the benefit of interest secured to it? The honorable gentleman from Virginia [Mr. CRAIG] has attempted an explanation of this delay; and if his explanation be taken, it constitutes, to my mind, the most conclusive argument against instead of in favor of this claim for interest; for it demonstrates, so far from involving the Government in fault, the whole fault to have been with the claimant. That gentleman says the claimant probably omitted to avail himself of the funding act, by which his debt might have been adjusted and interest secured upon it, if well founded, from a conviction that the promises or securities of the Government under the act would never be redeemed and paid. He despaired of ever being paid. Sir, are we then to pay interest for the delay of forty years in the settlement of this claim, because the claimant underrated the worth of the Government's promises, or misconceived the capacity of the Government to pay? With this explanation of the case, the claim for interest most certainly ceases to have any merit whatever, and should not be allowed.

It is said, in another quarter, that this case forms an exception to the generality of cases, because the Government agreed to pay interest on this denomination of claims, by the terms of the funding act. But the terms of that act embraced only such claimants as saw proper to or could avail themselves of it; and beyond this the act neither offered nor agreed, on the part of the Government, to pay interest. This claimant did not avail himself of that agreement; and the very fact that he did not is calculated to impress the mind with the conviction that something peculiar attached to the claim then, and which does not now appear, to debar it from allowance under the funding act. At all events, Mr. Chairman, there is no evidence of any laches on the part of the Government respecting this claim, to entitle it to peculiar favor. There is no proof of an unwillingness or omission on the part of the Government to pay it, after it has once been established by a compliance with the requisite formalities of legislation. And I do maintain that the same rule should be applied to it as has been applied to all other claims; which is, to pay it when established satisfactorily, and to pay nothing more on account of any delays that have been incident to its establishment. This has been the uniform rule of Government in all like cases, with perhaps an exception or two that cannot have weight; and it is the only rule that will be just or politic in practice. All hardships arising under this rule must be regarded as misfortunes, and not as wrongs; for the Government will always be just towards individuals, when its necessary requirements are complied with by them. I am constrained to vote in support of the motion of the gentleman from Vermont, [Mr. ALLEN,] and trust it will prevail. It involves a great principle, that should not be lost sight of or relaxed, under any circumstances that fall short of a positive agreement on the part of the Government to relax it, entered into at the origin of the claim that seeks to evade it.

The committee then rose and reported the bill to the House. The same bill coming up subsequently, on the question of engrossment—

Mr. ALLEN, of Vermont, moved to postpone its further consideration until to-morrow; which motion was lost.

Protective Duties.

[H. OF R.]

The question then recurred on ordering the bill to be engrossed for a third reading; at which stage of the business,

Mr. MANN, of New York, asked leave to submit a motion that when the House adjourn, it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

Objection having been made, the House, on motion of Mr. M., suspended the rule, to enable him to submit the same. And the motion to adjourn over was agreed to.

Mr. HANNEGAN, by consent, offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That a select committee be appointed to examine into the condition of the steamboat navigation of the country generally, the causes of the frequent disasters in that way, and the propriety of a general law for the regulation of such navigation.

The resolution was adopted.

And then, on motion of Mr. ALLEN,

MONDAY, DECEMBER 19.

PROTECTIVE DUTIES.

The SPEAKER announced that the unfinished business of the morning hour was the petition presented on Monday last, by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. ADAMS,] from eleven hundred citizens of Boston, praying for a reduction of the duty on foreign coal, and the further consideration of which had been postponed to this day.

[There were two motions pending: first, the motion of Mr. ADAMS to commit the petition to the Committee on Manufactures; and, secondly, the motion of Mr. PATTON to commit the same to the Committee of Ways and Means.]

Mr. ADAMS said he hoped the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. PATTON] would withdraw his motion for commitment, since that part of the President's message which referred to the protective duties had already been committed to the Committee on Manufactures. He (Mr. A.) presumed, of course, that all these petitions for the repeal of duty on coal, which was one of the protected articles, would go to that committee. When this petition was last before the House, he had asked for the yeas and nays on the question of reference, and the House had decided they should be taken. He did not, however, wish to consume the time of the House in that way, and he would be glad if his friend from Virginia would withdraw his motion, and permit the petition to go to the Committee on Manufactures.

Mr. PATTON said he was not present at the time the reference to which the gentleman from Massachusetts alluded had been made, and he could not, therefore, know what views were entertained by the House in giving that direction to the particular portion of the President's message which related to protective duties. If he (Mr. P.) were satisfied that it was the intention of the majority of the members of that House to dispose of the matter as had been indicated by the gentleman from Massachusetts, he (Mr. P.) would make no further question; but he apprehended such was not the intention of the House. There was so intimate a connexion between the subject of the protective system and that of the revenue system of the country, that there did not appear to him any absolute ground of preference for sending the subject to the one committee, and not to the other, except in so far as gentlemen were favorable to the tariff system, or inimical to it. It appeared to him that no one item of our tariff system could be touched, which was not to be supposed, directly or indirectly, to operate favorably or unfavorably upon the manufacturing interest. So, also, there was not one subject of manufacturing interest which was not supposed to act favorably or unfavorably on the question of revenue.

For himself, he considered that all that portion of the President's message which related to the reduction of duties was to be viewed in connexion with the existing state of our revenue. The object he had in view was, that the House might know, in touching the tariff system, how the revenue of the country would be affected. He considered the authority of the Government to interfere with the subject of imposts as extending only to the authority to raise revenue for the support of the Government; and, entertaining these views, he could not consent that the petition should go to the Committee on Manufactures.

Mr. CAMBRELENG expressed a hope that, after the debate which had taken place the other day, the time of the House would not now be consumed in discussing a similar question. By the result of that debate, this subject had been brought under the consideration of both committees; of the Committee of Ways and Means as a question of revenue, and of the Committee on Manufactures as a question of protective duty. It struck him, however, that, in the present instance, the House should not depart from its custom of referring these petitions to the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. C. was understood to allude to certain memorials on this subject, which had been referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, one of which was now before it. By a standing rule of the House, (proceeded Mr. C.,) it had been made the duty of the Committee of Ways and Means to report on these subjects of the revenue; and at every session of Congress petitions and memorials of a similar character had been referred. He did not wish to intrench on the duties of the Committee on Manufactures, but he hoped that, as a matter having natural reference to the revenue of the country, the memorial would be referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. ADAMS said that he should not have uttered one word further on this subject, if the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means [Mr. CAMBRELENG] had not intimated that the usual course had been for the House to refer these memorials to the Committee of Ways and Means. It had been the usual course of the House to refer them to the Committee on Manufactures quite as much as to the Committee of Ways and Means; and, at the very last session of Congress, petitions and memorials, and a proposition or resolution offered by the gentleman's colleague, a member of the Committee on Manufactures, had been referred to that very committee; therefore, so far as precedent went, the House had referred the subject to the Committee on Manufactures as well as to the Committee of Ways and Means. The petition now before the House was one which he (Mr. A.) had had the honor to present, not from his immediate constituents, but from his neighbors of the very next district. They had called upon him to present it, and he had done so. It was a petition for the reduction of the duty on foreign coal. He hoped the House would refer it, according to the principle which the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means had himself laid down for its reference; that was to say, precedent.

At the same time, it appeared very immaterial to him, after the reference which had been made of so much of the President's message as relates to the protective system, whether the petitions were referred to one committee or the other. Both committees, he presumed, would have the power to take up these petitions, to consider whether or not they had been referred to them under a general reference. But the very essence and quintessence of the question for the reduction of duty upon coal was a question of protective duties. Set aside the mere fact that the duty upon coal was made for the protection of the domestic industry of the country, and there would be no question at all to decide upon. There was not an article in all nature upon which there was a more unanimous opinion that the duty ought to be repealed, setting aside the question of duty. It was, therefore, essentially a question of protection, and not of duty.

Protective Duties.

Mr. McKEON said that the city he came from was deeply interested in this question. At this very moment, while we were debating the question of protection, the poor throughout this nation were suffering from this policy of protection. He was anxious the repeal should be made this session, and, to whatever committee it might be sent, that we should have a report and a decision of this House. The city of New York had for years petitioned on this subject, and yet nothing has been done to relieve them from this oppressive tax. The subject had been referred to the Committee of Ways and Means; it likewise had been in the charge of the committee; but yet, sir, nothing has been done. What I desire is, that some action should be had; that this matter shall not be tossed about from year to year, from committee to committee, without any result. The people, the suffering people, demand a decision. I am willing that it should be committed to the Ways and Means; it properly belongs to that body. If the position assumed by the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts be correct, he will drag within the extended circle of his jurisdiction every matter in the tariff. The proposition on the reduction of the duty on bread stuffs, introduced by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, should be sent to the Committee on Manufactures. This was not a question of protection, but of revenue. It was a question of taxation; whether exclusive legislation for the benefit of the few, at the sacrifice of the rights and comforts of the many, shall be continued; and, in that point of view, he wished the subject to be sent to the Committee of Ways and Means. We have millions overflowing our Treasury, and it became that committee, not the committee on protecting manufactures, to inquire how one could be reduced. The poor of the country were on the one side, and those to be protected on the other; and, for one, he wished to relieve the consumers from this tax.

Mr. HARPER was understood to say that he did not agree with the gentleman from New York, that this was altogether a question of revenue. Mr. H. alluded to the immense amounts of money which had been invested in this branch of domestic industry, (the coal mining,) under the belief that the protection which had been promised would be faithfully carried out. If the country was laboring under any evil from the want of an adequate supply of this necessary article, it was not because there was not an abundance of it in the country, provided the necessary time were given. Up to the year 1834, a sufficient number of purchasers could not be found to take up the supply which had been furnished. A single company alone, in Pennsylvania, had had great quantities lying over for want of purchasers.

From that time to the present, the demand had greatly increased; but, even during the last year, a great number of vessels had been employed in carrying coal to find a market. And if this market were thrown open to foreign competition, all these persons would be thrown out of occupation. To what committee, then, could the petition be so appropriately referred as to the Committee on Manufactures? From the Committee of Ways and Means (said Mr. H.) we can look for nothing but an adverse report. He hoped the subject would go, where it properly belonged, to the Committee on Manufactures. They would take into consideration the immense sums invested, as well as the labor of the vast number of hands employed in the trade. He saw no reason why this branch of domestic industry should alone be singled out, and he hoped that each branch would be made to bear its proportion of any reduction which might be considered requisite.

Mr. GIDEON LEE said it appeared to him immaterial to which committee the petition was referred; because the Committee of Ways and Means had certain duties to perform, and those duties involved this very question. To the Committee on Manufactures had been specially referred that portion of the President's message which related to protective duties, and in that portion of the message this article of fuel had been specially mentioned. But, as an apology to the Committee on Manufactures for the vote he was about to give, he would say that, at the last session of Congress, he had offered a resolution for the repeal of duties on foreign coal. He had moved its reference to the Committee of Ways and Means, but it was referred to the Committee on Manufactures, which committee did him the courtesy to discuss that resolution; and, if he remembered right, there were seven against a repeal of the duty; there was one qualified vote, and one vote for a repeal. In reference to his constituents, who consumed one and a half millions of dollars worth of this necessary article, no less necessary than bread, he would say this was a most important subject. He voted for the reference to the Committee of Ways and Means, because he expected from them a more rational, humane, and just report.

Mr. REED said that the object to be attained by the reference of these petitions was, to refer them to that committee, whichever it might be, who would furnish the House with more minute information than the members were supposed to possess. He took it for granted that they were all in favor of repealing the duty on foreign coal, wholly or in part, if it could be done without injuring any of the great interests of the country. The question presents itself: was the House prepared to repeal it? In what way would it affect the interest of the country? And this question he considered the Committee of Ways and Means were not prepared to examine. We were bound to refer all subjects to a committee that had charge of the particular interest to which they referred. He presumed there was no gentleman in that House who would pass a law which would destroy our coal mines.

He was desirous to have all the information which could be procured; and to whom should they look for it? The Committee of Ways and Means were prepared to show that the revenue of the country was abundant, without the duty on foreign coal. But was the House prepared to repeal it? It was necessary, before they advanced a step towards that measure, that they should ascertain what would be its effect on the great interest of the producer; and, to accomplish that object, the petition ought to be referred to the Committee on Manufactures, or some committee that would examine the subject fully, in all its bearings.

Mr. CHAMBERS, of Pennsylvania, said that if the rules of the House, defining the duties and powers of the committees, were to govern them, then he should say it was the duty of the House to determine this question by them. That which he termed the appropriate duty of the Committee of Ways and Means was to consider the ways and means of raising revenue. It had not been pretended that this question was to be considered at all with any reference to the raising of revenue. The revenue was more than abundant. Those who presented themselves to the consideration of this House asked for a reduction of duty. They asked not for the raising of revenue, but for its diminution. How, then, did the case present itself to the House? The gentleman from Massachusetts had asked a reference of the petition to the Committee on Manufactures; but it had been objected to that reference, that it should go from the committee having charge of the subject to the Committee of Ways and Means. He (Mr. C.) would say that the Committee on Manufactures was the appropriate committee; for the only question for the consideration of the committee was one of protection—of manufacturing interest; for coal was a manufacturing interest. The value of coal in the mine was but a secondary consideration; the value and the labor employed in digging and transporting it to market were the great objects of consideration. It was, therefore, a part of our manufacturing interest, and the question was to be considered in reference to that.

The duty now existing was not a duty for revenue, but of protection; and he trusted that the House, if it regarded its own rules, if it regarded the very interest represented in that memorial, would send it to the Committee on Manufactures, as the appropriate committee.

Mr. DAVIS said that it was he who had moved the postponement of the consideration of the memorial to the present day; and the object which he had in doing so had not, he regretted to say, been yet obtained. He was anxious that the States and Territories might be called for petitions and resolutions; the new States, west of the mountains, had not yet been called for resolutions; and although he did not wish to procrastinate the action of the House on this memorial, yet he must move a further postponement.

The new States, although in a minority, were yet entitled to rights in that House; and if they were put off until the end of the session, by the discussion of mere questions of reference, which were of no kind of importance now, because the subject had been already referred, they would not have an opportunity to bring any subject before the House. He hoped that the old States would act in a more liberal manner, and would give the new States a chance to be heard. He moved to postpone the further consideration of the subject until Monday next. And the question on the motion to postpone was taken, and decided in the negative: Yeas 72, nays 89. So the motion to postpone was rejected.

The question then recurring on the motion to refer,

Mr. CAMBRELENG addressed the House in reply to the remarks of Mr. REED, and proceeded to contend that the memorial was one which properly came under the jurisdiction of the Committee of Ways and Means. Mr. C. alluded to the great amount of information which was at present in the possession of that committee; an amount, he said, which would astonish the House when laid before it. The importation of coal had trebled within three years, and the increase in its consumption had been immense. He held in his hand a petition, signed by 8,000 persons in the city of New York, asking for a reduction of the duty on coal; and it was because that duty was not wanted for revenue that its reduction was asked. He hoped that the petition of these poor shivering people, who were suffering from the inclemency of the season, would be taken care of by the member from Massachusetts, [Mr. ADAMS.]

Mr. DENNY said that the gentleman from New York, [Mr. CAMBRELENG,] with a view to give such a direction to the memorial as he desired, wished the House to believe that the Committee of Ways and Means were in possession of information such as was not in the knowledge of any other members of the House. Now, although that gentleman might be in possession of information relative to the importation and consumption of coal in the city of New York, there was other information, equally important, in possession of the Committee on Manufactures, which was not in the possession of the Committee of Ways and Means. He believed that these memorials were not the spontaneous call for a repeal by our citizens, but that they were set on foot by the emissaries of foreign monopolists, the owners of the Nova Scotia coal mines, &c., which were owned in great part by citizens of New York. He wished to have all the information that could be procured. He did not wish this House to be troubled with memorials, got up by foreign nations. He did not say that these memorials now before the House had such an origin; but he knew that such agents had been instrumental in bringing this subject before Congress some years past. In all that the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means had said, he was influenced by his constituents; and it was his (Mr. D's) wish that the memorial should be referred to the committee which had heretofore taken charge of questions of protection. That committee was the Committee on Manufactures.

Mr. INGERSOLL said that there seemed to be peculiar circumstances connected with the proposed reduction of the duty on coal, which it was proper to bring before the consideration of the House, and which, he believed, had not as yet been brought before it. He believed that the Committee on Manufactures was the proper committee. The evil which was complained of, and which it was alleged ought to lead to the reduction of duty on foreign coal, was a temporary evil. It was not generally known, and yet it was true, that there had heretofore been a redundancy of coal from the mines of Pennsylvania; and that, in consequence of that redundancy, the article had sold particularly low. This was the first time that there had been a deficiency, and this it was that had occasioned the high price in market. The House then was legislating on an emergency, which might contribute to erroneous legislation, if all the circumstances were not taken into account. This was one consideration which should operate in the settlement of this question of reference. The coal capitalists were sufferers, and not gainers, by the present state of things. They had sold their coal; and now, when it was at high prices, they (that was to say, the manufacturer or developer of the coal) must suffer. They had supplied the community with coal at the former prices, whilst those who had received them in Boston, New York, or elsewhere, had put their own prices on the article. This would show that the whole subject required particular investigation, and that it would not be proper to decide upon it without referring it to a committee who would look to it in all its aspects as a question of general reduction.

On another day it had been remarked by a gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. PICKENS] that the compromise which had been made here a few years ago was to be honorably preserved; and he (Mr. I.) believed that no one desired to interfere with it. How could a proper knowledge be acquired of the redundancy or deficiency of revenue? How was the fact to be ascertained? In the first place, by the Committee of Ways and Means, who had the subject referred to them; and let the general subject of reduction be considered and reported on by them. But when you come to particular articles, when you come to ascertain whether the article of sugar in Louisiana will bear a reduction without sacrificing the interests of that State, where should such a subject be referred? Where can the particular information, which is requisite to proper legislation, be procured, except from those who are conversant with the particular article under consideration? Mr. I. applied this argument to the articles of iron, salt, bread stuffs, &c.

In conclusion, Mr. I. said that the committee which possessed the best information was the committee most competent to take charge of the memorial. With this view, he was in favor of reference to the Committee on Manufactures.

Mr. BOON said that if this was a subject of protection, he would vote with the gentleman from Massachusetts; but this was the first time he had ever heard that coal was an article of manufacture. He had always thought that it was given by the bounty of the God of nature, as the water that flows from the Alleghany to the Mississippi; and if this monopoly was to be kept up, by continuing to raise a revenue on coal, loss must fall on the manufacturers of the country, for their operations were mostly carried on by coal. No evil could result to them, even to say nothing about the poor. But how were they suffering? Look at the poor of Washington; wood six dollars a cord, and coal proportionably high. The duty on coal constitutes a monopoly. He was in favor of reference to the Committee of Ways and Means; and when the question should come up he would vote to take off the duty as well from coal as from salt.

The question was then taken on the motion of Mr. ADAMS, to refer the memorial to the Committee on Manufactures; on which motion the yeas and nays were taken, and were: Yeas 88, nays 124.

So the motion of Mr. ADAMS was negatived.

And the question was then taken on the motion of Mr. PATTON, to refer the memorial to the Committee of Ways and Means, and was decided in the affirmative.

STEAMBOAT ACCIDENTS.

Mr. STORER offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to inquire what legal enactments are necessary by Congress to prevent accidents on board of vessels navigating the waters of the United States by steam, and for the punishment of the commanders, pilots, and engineers of such vessels, who may be guilty of wilful misconduct or neglect in the navigation thereof.

Mr. HANNEGAN said, if he understood the English language at all, his resolution covered every possible case which might arise; at least he intended it to do so. He was aware that the Committee on the Judiciary might be the most appropriate standing committee of the House to which to refer the subject; but he was aware, at the same time, that, from the great mass of business before that committee, it perhaps would not be able to pay so much attention to the subject as a select committee would; and for that reason, and that alone, he had asked for a select committee. If the resolution of the gentleman from Ohio should be adopted, Mr. H's resolution would be nullified. He had no disposition to place himself in a more conspicuous position, but he thought the resolution he had submitted would cover every case. He therefore hoped the gentleman would withdraw his resolution.

Mr. STORER only wished to bring the subject before the committee in some tangible form. He wished the examination to extend not only to the bursting of boilers of steamboats, but to accidents from racing, and all accidents from the carelessness of pilots. He then modified his resolution, so as to refer the subject to the select committee, instead of the Committee on the Judiciary; and, so modified, the resolution was agreed to.

WEST POINT ACADEMY.

The following resolution having been moved by Mr. HANNEGAN—

Resolved, That the select committee appointed to investigate the affairs of the West Point Academy be authorized, by themselves or a sub-committee, to visit the Academy, for the purposes mentioned in the resolution under which they were appointed.

Mr. D. J. PEARCE said he hoped some reason would be assigned for the adoption of this resolution. If any member of the committee would state that such a step was necessary to the successful prosecution of the investigation, he (Mr. P.) was willing that the resolution should be adopted. But it struck him that all the information to be derived from this proposed visit, with the exception probably of an inspection of the building itself, could be got at the office of the chief engineer, established in this city. The whole history of the institution, the number of students, and the mode of their appointment, were matters of record. Under these circumstances, he did not see the necessity for the visit, but would give way if any such could be made to appear.

Mr. HAWES said that, at the very first meeting, he believed, which the committee had held, when all the members save one were present, it had been unanimously agreed that, in their opinion, it was necessary to pursue this course. Take it on what ground you please, on the score of economy, or any other ground that the imagination could conceive, this, according to his notion, was the proper course. He said thus much as the organ of the committee, and left the House to determine the propriety of the measure.

Mr. D. J. PEARCE said that he felt sorry, after the gentleman's explanation, that he must still vote against the resolution. It was nothing to him (Mr. P.) whether the committee were unanimous or not. He had not yet heard a reason for the visit, and the House certainly must have some reason to act upon.

Mr. LANE was in favor of the adoption of the resolution, because he thought that if the committee visited the institution they would return with the conviction that it constituted one of the brightest ornaments of our country.

Mr. JARVIS thought the House had had enough of travelling committees. With a view to avoid loss of time in a useless discussion, he moved to lay the resolution on the table.

Mr. GRENELL asked for the yeas and nays on that motion; which the House refused to order.

And the question was then taken, and decided in the affirmative: Yeas 87, nays 54.

So the resolution was laid on the table.

ABOLITION MEMORIALS.

Mr. DAVIS offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That all petitions, memorials, remonstrances, or other papers, which may be offered during the present session, in any manner relating to the abolition of slavery, or the slave trade, in the District of Columbia, or any of the Territories of the United States, shall, on presentation, be laid upon the table, without reading, without being ordered to be printed, and without debate.

Mr. REED did hope this resolution would not be agreed to, for he thought it better to allow these memorials to take the usual course. It was better for the purpose of allaying the excitement on this subject; better for the North as well as for the South.

Mr. CALHOUN, of Massachusetts, moved to lay the resolution on the table; which was agreed to without a count.

WESTERN HOSPITALS.

Mr. REYNOLDS, of Illinois, submitted the following: Resolved, That a select committee be appointed, to take into consideration the subject of establishing commercial hospitals on the Western waters.

Mr. WHITTLESEY, of Ohio, inquired if this subject had not been already referred to the standing Committee on Commerce; and if they had not at this time the matter under consideration, the better course would be to send this resolution to that committee.

Mr. REYNOLDS remarked that he could scarcely expect to succeed against the motion made by his friend from Ohio, [Mr. WHITTLESEY.]

[Mr. WHITTLESEY stated that he made no motion, but only suggested as above.]

Mr. R. said that this was a subject of great importance to the majority of the people of the West; and on that consideration he moved the resolution, and hoped it would pass. The Committee on Commerce were all taken from the Atlantic States, and of course were not as fully acquainted with the facts and necessities of the people as those who live in the West. The Committee on Commerce, it was true, had this subject before them; but nothing was done on the subject. He hoped something would be done this session. Hospitals in proper places in the West would do great service to a very worthy class of citizens.

Mr. GILLET replied that a bill had been reported from the Committee on Commerce at the last session, embracing the object contemplated in the resolution, but had not been acted upon.

After a few words from Messrs. REYNOLDS, LANE, BRIGGS, and VINTON, on motion of the last gentleman, the resolution was referred to the same committee which had the bill in charge, viz: the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, by a vote of 73 ayes, nees not counted.

A great number of resolutions were submitted to-day, by different gentlemen, all of which, were appropriately referred.

And then the House adjourned.

TUESDAY, DECEMBER 20.

PROPERTY LOST IN THE MILITARY SERVICE.

After the reception and disposition of sundry resolutions,

On motion of Mr. E. WHITTLESEY, the House suspended the rule for the purpose of taking up the bill which had passed through Committee of the Whole on Friday last, entitled a bill to provide for the payment of horses and other property lost or destroyed in the military service of the United States. The question being on its final passage,

Mr. A. MANN rose to inquire whether the bill embraced, or was intended to embrace, all the cases of horses or other property lost in the military service of the United States, from the day of the declaration of independence up to that time; or whether its operation was confined to any particular period. It could not be unknown that a vast number of claims had been presented to the United States for horses destroyed, and which had been adjudicated favorably or unfavorably; a large number unfavorably, from the want of proper evidence to support them. He wished to inquire whether it was intended to open all these cases anew? He would admit that the principle of the bill was correct; but if its operation was not limited to some particular period, he would be under the necessity of voting against it.

Mr. E. WHITTLESEY said that, in reply to the gentleman from New York, he would remark that, when the Committee of Claims presented the bill, its operation extended only so far back as the year 1822. The last act which had been passed on the subject was in reference to horses destroyed during the Seminole war, and it was thought proper by the Committee of Claims to embrace all other claims, from the date of that act to the passage of this.

The gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. HARDIN,] when in Committee of the Whole, moved to amend the bill by striking out the act of 1822, and inserting the act of June, 1812. This amendment was agreed to by the committee, and subsequently concurred in by the House; so that the operation of the act, as it at present stood, extended back to June, 1812.

So far as related to the other inquiries made by the gentleman from New York, whether it was intended to embrace cases already passed upon, he (Mr. W.) would answer, that the bill embraced only that class of cases which had either been heretofore embraced in general laws, or had been heretofore recognised by general legislation. There was not a single new case embraced in the bill; but the object was to transfer to the proper accounting officers of the Department that labor which had heretofore been performed by committees; by which means, the parties applying for redress would obtain it without the slow process of the legislation of Congress.

Mr. W. thought that if the gentleman would read the bill with care, he would be satisfied that there was no one case contemplated in the bill which would not merit that gentleman's support, if brought singly before the House.

Mr. MANN said that if the chairman of the Committee of Claims [Mr. E. WHITTLESEY] was satisfied that the bill had reference only to such cases as ought to be embraced, and as it was usual to bring before that committee, he (Mr. M.) had no objection to vote in favor of it.

And the question "Shall the bill pass?" was then put, and decided in the affirmative.

So the bill was passed.

Numerous petitions and resolutions were offered to-day; after which, the House, in pursuance of its order of yesterday, went into the election of

TENNESSEE LAND BILL.

Mr. DUNLAP asked the consent of the House to go into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, on the "bill to amend the act to authorize the State of Tennessee to issue grants of land in certain cases," (commonly called the "Tennessee land bill.") He would barely remark that he hoped he should get the assent of the House to this motion, since the bill in question had received the favorable report of a committee of that House as long ago as the year 1825, and it had been before the House from that time to the present.

Mr. HARDIN objecting,

Mr. DUNLAP moved a suspension of the rule; but the motion was lost, without a division.

SURPLUS REVENUE.

To the honorable the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled:

The undersigned, citizens of the first congressional district in the State of North Carolina, have for years past been accustomed to regard the action of the Federal Government with great anxiety. Your petitioners have forborne to urge their just claims for such appropriations for public works in their immediate neighborhood as fall within the peculiar province of the General Government, trusting to the tardy justice of Congress.

They have regretted to see appropriations of the public money not equally distributed with a view to the general benefit.

Your petitioners have viewed with great satisfaction the bill of the last session regulating the deposits of the public money among the several States. They regard this measure as the safest disposition of the national treasure, as best calculated to avoid all unjust, unconstitutional and partial appropriations of the common fund. They therefore pray that provisions similar to that contained in the deposit bill of the last session may become the law of the Union for several succeeding years.

Mr. W. B. SHEPARD, on presenting the above petition, made the following remarks:

Mr. S. said the petition was signed by very respectable individuals in the district which he had the honor to represent, and he was desirous of adding his testimony to theirs. The petitioners (said Mr. S.) approve of the deposite bill of the last session, and pray Congress to reenact a similar measure. They suppose that, until 1842, when the tariff will come before Congress for readjustment, there can be no better disposition of the unavoidable surplus in the Treasury than to put it in the custody of the people. Mr. S. said he had been astonished at the manifest attempt to paralyze the deposite bill of the last session, and to make it unpopular with the people. He trusted all such attempts would fail, and that there would be sufficient good sense left with the people not to sacrifice their real substantial interests to mere party clamor. Individually believing an annual distribution of the surplus revenue, for several years to come, the only possible mode of checking the downward path of this Government, he would proceed to state to the House his reasons for that belief.

Surplus Revenue.

I do not (said Mr. S.) regard the plan of distributing the public funds as merely placing so much money in the possession of the States; if that were the limit of its benefits, it would be a matter of minor importance. I regard it as a policy pregnant with the most lasting and extensive political consequences. It is a fact, apparent to every body, and one which all admit but the most obturate political hacks, that the public mind is now, and has for years been, in a state of dangerous and unhealthy excitement. Through the stimulants which are daily and hourly applied to the people by a most inflammatory public press; through official documents, made with no view of elucidating the truth, but merely to flatter and cajole the community, we are passing from one excitement to another, until the voice of soberness and truth will be banished from the land, as utterly beneath the attention of this chivalrous and high-minded people, who act as if they were privileged by Heaven to commit all sorts of follies, without the fear of retribution. Hence it is, whilst this nation has advanced with unprecedented rapidity in individual and social improvement, her political condition has become most degraded and corrupt.

That these evils have been brought upon the country by the present administration has frequently been asserted in the two Houses of Congress, and the sentiment has been so often resolved to be true in political meetings of the people, that it requires some hardihood to doubt its correctness. In attributing to General Jackson, exclusively, such important results, we degrade the mass of the community; we mistake the effect for the cause; we do not go to the source of our disease; we attribute to one man what has been produced by the folly and indiscretion of thousands. Never having been either the flatterer or the reviler of the present Chief Magistrate, I hope I may be excused when I say that he is but the profecta algâ of the present disturbed and agitated pool of politics.

Whence is it that this state of things should exist? Are the people less virtuous than formerly? Are they less capable of protecting their rights? No! it is because the thirst for office is insatiable; and so long as the presidency of the United States presents a glittering prize, to be reached by agitation, and by agitation alone, so long will the nation be periodically subverted from its very foundations, and the wished-for goal attained by the boldest or the meanest. The presidential election is the curse of the country; it absorbs and perverts every other consideration; it engrosses nearly the exclusive attention of both Houses of Congress, and gives a false coloring to every thing. To its pervading influence is to be attributed nearly every thing that is vicious in our system.

An honorable member from New York, [Mr. CAMBRELENG,] who occupies a distinguished party stand on this floor, in excusing the little progress made during the last session by his political friends in reform, asserted that, during the pendency of the presidential election, no system of reform could be perfected; and yet, sir, when an honorable member from Virginia [Mr. WISE] attempted a few days ago to probe the rottenness of this administration, we heard the most doleful and pitiable lamentations upon the horrible cruelty of disturbing the retirement of the greatest and best of men. I would be glad to know when this House expects to be relieved from that degrading incubus which touches every thing, and defiles every thing with its touch. I have been a member of this body for several years; I have seen no question, from the political tariffs to the printing of the most paltry trash distributed by this House, which has not been discussed and decided with a view to the presidential election. So much is this generally the case, that strangers are puzzled to find out the subject from the discussions of the body.

It was for these reasons that I rejoiced to see the deposite bill of the last session. I think it will establish a new era in this country; it will eventually open the eyes of the people to their real and substantial interests; it will allure the mass of the community from idle and abstract political disquisitions, which are of no use, and induce them to regard this Government as a practical thing, intended for some useful purpose, which, when it ceases to fulfil it, should cease to exist.

It is, moreover, the only possible mode in which any thing like reform can be introduced into the Augean stables at Washington. Ever since that stupendous fraud which was so successfully played off before the people in 1826, commonly called the report on reform, we have had repetitions of the same farce before the same credulous audiences, only under different names, with the characters recast, and the phraseology somewhat changed. Sometimes it has limped over the stage in the modest and harmless garb of a report on executive patronage; anon it comes sweeping by in a presidential message, with a grandiloquent attempt to amend the constitution. And yet, amidst all these patriotic aspirations to remedy dangers which all have admitted at some stage or other of their political advancement, the abuses of the Government have increased and are increasing, and it seems they cannot be diminished, whilst the expenses of these abuses have swelled from about $10,000,000 in 1823, to $32,000,000 in 1836. If every branch of the public service were well administered, if there were ability in the design or vigor in the execution of the duties of the several departments, there might be some excuse for this lavish prodigality of the public treasure; the reverse, however, is notoriously the case; presidential electioneering is the only merit of your officers, and their inefficiency in their departments ceases to be remarkable, or to attract public attention.

So long as that divinity which hedges the chief magistracy of the country is protected from the rude assaults of his opponents, the delinquencies of the subordinates are unnoticed. The constitution undoubtedly intended the Chief Magistrate for the responsible head of the Government; but it never supposed his name would be a shield behind which every species of ignorance and corruption could be safely intrenched. Such, however, is the operation of this Government, arising from the ardor with which one side seeks, and the other defends, the presidential chair. The grossest mismanagement is now asserted to exist in a department indispensable to the public defence; and yet, sir, its official head abandons it in the midst of its embarrassments, not to explain or to justify his conduct, but to heap further obligations upon a credulous nation, for his important public services. The inquisitorial powers of this House, which were intended to ferret out abuses, and to awaken the attention of the people to the action of the Government, are completely neutralized and perverted by the all-pervading influence of the presidential election. Unless a movement here can elevate or depress the presidential thermometer, it falls upon inattentive and lifeless ears.

The successful party momentarily rests from its violence when it has placed its favorite in the chair of state; and, reposing under his laurels, great patience is exhibited until his transcendent virtues shall rectify every abuse. Should the faithful be disappointed, the misfortune is attributed to the evil eye of their opponents, and the same dull round is again run over, of paltry excuses and miserable chicane.

Let us, then, by returning annually the surplus revenue to the people, strip the Federal Government of its great attraction, and lessen its power for evil; let us give to the community some inducement to examine and narrow down the expenses of this Government to the smallest sum which can possibly serve to keep the machine in motion. Since its corruptions are incurable, let us no longer deceive the people with idle projects of reform; let us strip the reeling prodigal of the means of pandering to his appetites, and starve him to sobriety.

I sincerely believe some such plan as this is indispensably necessary to revive the chilled and slumbering affection of a large mass of the people of this country for the Federal Government. It is a fact notorious within the sphere of my observation, and one which it would be unwise to conceal, that there is no longer that ardent and lively attachment to the Federal Government which once existed; there is a large mass of discontent throughout the community—a discontent not to be removed by ejaculations of union, issuing from the pampered slaves of power, but by a fair administration of the Government. No party drill can forever proscribe the virtue and talent of a community; they will eventually burst their cerements, and expose the miserable cheat which obscured them to the contempt and derision of the world. Let not gentlemen deceive themselves by supposing that this discontent arises from the adverse political fortunes of any individual; it is not so, sir. It arises from the belief that this Government always has been, and always will be, unfairly and partially administered. Whether it be that our constitution is one of those unfortunate instruments which cannot be correctly construed, or from the unimprovable condition of the Southern country, the fact is, a large portion of the Southern people find themselves as they were at the Revolution, a proscribed and slandered people, with a Government alien to them in feeling, and administered adversely to their interests—a Government which, whilst it draws annually from an abused and derided population millions of money, yet, with a most culpable and cowardly imbecility, exposes that population not only to the insidious assaults of an implacable domestic enemy, but likewise to the open violence of a foreign foe.

Return back to those who pay the larger part some portion of the money not essential to the administration of the Government, and you may go on in your disgusting squabbles for the presidency; the people will be satisfied with this small approach to virtue;

"If Rome be served, and glorious, Careless they by whom."

To the Southern country the distribution of the surplus revenue offers the only practicable mode of obtaining any share whatever in the enormous appropriations of public money which are made at every session of Congress. From the geographical position of that country, and its peculiar constitutional opinions, (which, being honestly entertained, will not be easily abandoned,) there is but little spent among its population in those public works which absorb such vast sums. The western parts of New York are indented with harbors, made at the expense of the nation; the present Vice President, although embarrassed with as many constitutional scruples as fall to the lot of most men, has had fortune buckled on his back, because the United States have most pertinaciously insisted upon making a harbor somewhere near his property. Now, sir, I do not complain of this. I rather urge it as an objection to a system which, in spite of all the honest endeavors of individuals to the contrary, has enriched and will continue to enrich them at the expense of the nation. If the surplus revenue be not distributed annually among the States, what will you do with it? The glorious work of destroying a general system of internal improvement has already been achieved; a few private jobs have alone escaped the general wreck, to keep up the flagging ardor of doubtful adherents. I know of but one objection at this time to a permanent distribution of the surplus revenue among the States; (for I cannot believe that even the dotage of this absurd administration is prepared to plunge this nation at this time into the difficulties of another tariff discussion.)

The real objection to a deposit of the money of the nation with the States arises from the extreme desire entertained by the Secretary of the Treasury and the party, of giving to the country a better currency; or, in other words, of enabling some great Bombastes Furioso to experiment upon the subject of gold.

By regulating the currency is now meant the power of transferring the public funds about the country, so as to suit the gambling speculations of those persons who have interest enough to be admitted into the secrets of the party. I believe, however, the mass of the community are now fully aware (if they were honest enough to admit it) that they have brought upon the country much pecuniary distress, and committed an egregious folly, by sustaining the many absurd attempts to improve the currency by which we have been lately annoyed.

The Bank of the United States, through its branches, operated as a great artery, by means of which the money of the nation, which was constantly accumulating in the city of New York, through your unequal commercial system, was distributed among the people of the Union; you have, however, cut off this supply; you have dammed up the money of the nation in the large cities, and unless there is an annual distribution, we in the remote parts of the country can hope for nothing but from the overflowings of their abundance. I hope, sir, I can mention the name of the Bank of the United States without destroying the composure of those gentlemen who are usually thrown into a sort of paroxysm of patriotic frenzy whenever that enemy to "life, liberty, or the pursuit of happiness," is incidentally alluded to; who cannot forgive the Bank of the United States for not having bowed down and worshipped the political Moloch of the day.

To me it is matter of great joy that, amidst the general wreck of every thing valuable in the country, there has been found one institution bold enough to resist, and adroit enough to elude, the combined attack of vulgar ignorance and desperate malignity.

I forbear discussing the objections which have been brought by the office-holders against any distribution of the surplus funds.

Some take shelter behind your tattered and degraded constitution; others are afraid of corrupting the people; and, animated with that Roman virtue so common at Washington, as true and sturdy patriots, like ancient Curtius, they plunge into the abyss and corrupt themselves.

There must be, for years to come, an immense surplus revenue—a revenue which the utmost ingenuity of the party has been, and will be, unable entirely to squander. The system of internal improvement by the Government is no more; the necessities of the times do not require large military appropriations; the tariff cannot be disturbed without great individual embarrassment, and bringing upon the nation the charge of bad faith; why, then, should we hesitate to snatch from the irresponsible hands of the pet banks and the public officers money which does not belong to them, and which cannot be safely left with them?

We have heard for years past, on this floor, the most extravagant adulation of the people and devotion to their interests; let us give a proof of our sincerity in the only way in which it can ever be tested. North Carolina has, in common with all the States, a deep interest in this question. She is now commencing a system of internal improvement which will entail upon her vast expenses. Where is she to procure the funds? She has surrendered to the General Government the customs, the only safe and profitable mode of public revenue; let us beware how we teach the people of the South to reflect whether they have received an adequate consideration for this most liberal bequest. Let us not, by our selfishness, by our cold insensibility to their claims, open their eyes to that inconsiderate liberality which gave to such a Government as this the entire profit upon their industry and their vast natural resources.

Our institutions are based upon frugality, not only in the people, but likewise in their officers; our legislation has generated an unfortunate state of society, where the "auri sacra fames" controls every thing, extinguishes every generous and manly feeling, and condemns the hungry seeker after office, as well as the trembling placeman, to the humiliating confession that he cannot afford to be independent.

If there is any one characteristic in the official profligacy which now pervades this country more alarming than another, it is the universal sycophancy and want of independence in those persons who pretend to lead public sentiment, from the humblest porter at the palace to him that has or he that hopes to get an office; there is but one requisite, one criterion of merit—blind, devoted attachment to an individual. It has become, of late years, quite the fashion, in certain circles, where a hatred of the slaveholders atones for every vice, both moral and political, to speak disparagingly of the South, on account of its slave population. In my humble opinion, the poorest as well as the meanest slave that ever toiled in a Southern swamp, under a Southern sun, ay, sir, and under the lash of a legal Southern master, is an animal more to be respected, less needing the "labor of love" of your crazy philanthropists, than one of your puppet Secretaries, who is obliged to permit any man on earth, whether that man is vain enough to believe himself born to command, or a mere scullion of the kitchen, to tell him he is "free to entertain an opinion." The one, benighted in mind, is the honest and faithful servant of a lawful master—of a master by whose bounty he is fed, and to whom he is attached by the recollections of childhood and the best feelings of our nature; the other, surrounded by civilization, by liberty, and science, is a slave from choice, a prostitute from principle—a slavery worse than Egyptian bondage, for it is a slavery of the mind.

Can you tell me, Mr. Speaker, what is this thing they call love of party, which so much surpasses the "love of woman?" I have heard of the love a poet bears his muse, the adoration a lover feels towards his mistress, and the devotion of a patriot for his country; but I confess I have not sufficient knowledge of the Lex Parliamentaria to understand this love of party. Is it similar to the spirit of patriotism? Not at all! for it is a spirit hostile to the mass of the community, based upon selfishness, and leading its votaries by the hope of plunder. It is a spirit that confounds, in the breasts of the few honest who submit to its degrading influence, all just discrimination between right and wrong, and proscribes from its service all those who will not tame their nature down to do its dirty bidding.

"For he must serve, who fain would sway,
And sooth, and sue, and watch all time, and pry into all place,
And be a living lie, who would become A mighty thing amongst the mean; and such Are parties made of."

It was once supposed (perhaps it was an error of our ancestors) that honor was the quickening principle of monarchies, virtue of republics; and that those who ministered to the vestal flame should at least possess a spark of its purity. Not a virtue content to dwell in decencies forever, but a virtue that regarded political apostasy equally infamous with private dishonor; a virtue too pure, united to a soul too proud of filling situations of constant uneasiness and uncertainty, of exhibiting to the world the melancholy spectacle of a high republican functionary willing to be honest, yet afraid to avow it, who, when called upon for his opinion upon matters of great national importance, in the morning said ay, sir; and at noon said no, sir. Yet these things have happened almost daily, and not excited our special wonder.*

Since, then, the seductions of your Government are too great for poor human nature, let us return to the poverty and simplicity of our ancestors; let us remove a temptation which cannot be resisted, and the road to office will again become the path of duty and of honor.

It was my intention, at one time, to refer this petition to the Committee of Ways and Means, with instructions to bring in a bill in conformity with the prayer of the petitioners. Upon reflection, I will not do so; I will let the petition go untrammelled to the committee, and whatever there may be of good issuing from them may perhaps suffice.

I prefer this course, because, of the two propositions which have heretofore been submitted to this House, I decidedly prefer the bill for distributing the proceeds of the sales of the public lands; it is less objectionable in principle, and gives equal justice to all parts of the Union. That this most just measure should have met so much hostility is to me matter of great amazement. Perhaps it owes its poor success to the misfortune of being the offspring of a justly distinguished American statesman. If the Committee of Ways and Means would have it rebaptized with some of the cant names of the day, it has merit enough to become even one of the pets of the party.

To those gentlemen who are really desirous of wresting from this Government its means of bribery and corruption, I would suggest the propriety of surrendering individual preferences, and adopting any measure which can possibly aid this holy cause, which can elevate the tone of sentiment and feeling among the people, or can give them juster views of their rights and their duties; otherwise, the reign of misrule will be a perpetual succession, in defiance of the continual stirring of the filth of Washington.

THE GENERAL POST OFFICE.

The following message was received from the President of the United States:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

GENTLEMEN: Herewith I transmit you a report of the Postmaster General, and recommend the passage of such laws and the making of such appropriations as may be necessary to carry into effect the measures adopted by him for resuming the business of the Department under his charge, and securing the public property in the old Post Office building.

It is understood that the building procured for the temporary use of the Department is far from being fire-proof, and that the valuable books and papers secured from the recent conflagration will there be exposed to similar dangers. I therefore feel it my duty to recommend an immediate appropriation for the construction of a fire-proof General Post Office, that the materials may be obtained within the present winter, and the building erected as rapidly as practicable.

ANDREW JACKSON.

DECEMBER 20, 1836.

Document accompanying the President's message.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT,

December 20, 1836.

SIR: On the morning of the 15th instant, I performed the painful duty of reporting to you orally the destruction of the General Post Office building by fire, and received your instructions to inquire into the cause and extent of the calamity, for the purpose of enabling you to make a communication to Congress.

A few hours afterwards I received, through the chairman of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads of the House of Representatives, an official copy of a resolution adopted by that House, instructing the committee to institute a similar inquiry, and the chairman asked for such information as it was in my power to give. The investigation directed by you was thus rendered unnecessary.

The corporation of the city of Washington, with honorable promptitude, offered the Department the use of the west wing of the City Hall, now occupied by the Mayor and Councils and their officers, and the officers of the Chesapeake and Ohio Canal Company. The proprietors of the Medical College also tendered the use of their building, on E street, and offers were made of several other buildings in the central parts of the city. An examination was made of such as promised by their magnitude to afford sufficient room for the force employed in the Department, but none were found equal, in the commodiousness of their interior structure and abundant room, to Fuller's hotel, opposite the buildings occupied by the Treasury Department, on Pennsylvania Avenue. That building has been obtained on terms which the accompanying papers will fully exhibit. The business of the Department will be immediately resumed in that building.

The agreement with Mr. Fuller will make necessary an immediate appropriation by Congress, and upon that body will devolve also the duty of providing for the payment of the rent, if they shall approve of the arrangement.

In the mean time, steps have been taken to secure all that is valuable in the ruins of the Post Office building, and to protect from the weather the walls of so much of it as was occupied by the General Post Office, which stands firm.

The Department has no fund at command, out of which the services necessary in the accomplishment of the objects can be paid for, nor has it the means to replace the furniture which has been lost, and must be immediately obtained to enable the clerks to proceed with their current business.

These facts I deem it my duty to report to you, that you may recommend to Congress such measures thereupon as you may deem expedient.

With the highest respect, your obedient servant,
AMOS KENDALL.

To the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

On motion of Mr. SHIELDS, the message and accompanying documents were referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, and ordered to be printed.

After the presentation of various petitions and memorials,

Mr. BELL, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, reported a bill to regulate, in certain cases, the disposition of the proceeds of lands ceded by Indian tribes to the United States; which said bill was passed in Committee of the Whole House, (Mr. GARLAND, of Virginia, in the chair,) and ordered to be engrossed, and read a third time to-morrow.

Mr. CAMBRELENG, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported bills of the following titles, viz:

A bill making an appropriation for the suppression of Indian hostilities;

A bill making appropriations for the payment of the revolutionary and other pensioners of the United States for 1837;

A bill making appropriations for the naval service for 1837;

A bill making appropriations for the support of the army for the year 1837;

A bill making appropriations for certain fortifications of the United States for the year 1837;

A bill making appropriations for the current expenses of the Indian department, and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with the various Indian tribes, for the year 1837;

Which said bills were severally read, and referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

WEST POINT ACADEMY.

The business next in order was the motion, submitted yesterday by Mr. D. J. PEARCE, to reconsider the vote by which a resolution heretofore offered, authorizing the select committee appointed on the affairs of this institution to visit the same, for the purposes of their investigation, had been laid on the table.

Mr. WARD said he should vote in favor of reconsideration, and before doing so he wished to state his reasons to the House. He regretted that the House should have raised a select committee at all on this subject; but inasmuch as the House had done so, and the committee had been appointed, he was clearly of opinion that the House should accord to them the privileges they desired. It was the wish of the committee either that all or a portion of their number should have an opportunity to get information which they considered important to the successful issue of their investigation.

It would be in the recollection of every member of this House that this question had been brought up for their consideration for several years in succession. At one time the subject had been referred to the Committee on Military Affairs; that committee, by their chairman, presented a report, which he considered unanswerable. The gentlemen, however, who were opposed to that institution, were not satisfied with the vote then taken, and had brought the matter before Congress every session, and at length a select committee had been appointed, not only to inquire into what they alleged to be abuses, but into the expediency of abolishing the institution altogether. That committee had made what he had no doubt was a very able report, but it had never been printed. It had been suggested to him that if that report was printed it might possibly throw all the light upon the subject that was necessary.

He, for one, was entirely willing to indulge the committee in their request, because he was of opinion that, however prejudiced the gentlemen composing it might now be against that institution, when they gave to it a personal examination they would return to this House with very different impressions, and that they would be entirely satisfied that it was an institution which ought to be sustained by the country. With this view it was that he should now record his vote in favor of the motion for reconsideration; and that, if that motion prevailed, he should then vote for the adoption of the resolution. The members of that House all knew that, for several years past, the federal Executive had selected gentlemen as a board of visitors to examine into that institution, amongst whom there had been some who were strongly prejudiced against it; and yet he believed that, with one exception in the case of a gentleman from Ohio, not one of these visitors, after that examination, had raised his voice against the Academy. He (Mr. W.) would not detain the House with any general observations at this time, but he took this opportunity to state that one of the most distinguished officers of the army of the United States, alluding to this institution in the course of a conversation with him, (Mr. W.,) had made the remark, "that it was his opinion that the institution was better calculated to keep alive the military spirit of the country than any other that existed; and that he would rather himself leave the service forever, and see the army disbanded, than he would see that institution abolished."

Executive Administration—Cumberland Road.

But it struck him (Mr. W.) that the officers of the army would have great reason to apprehend that they were not the favorites of Congress, judging, at least, from the course which Congress had pursued towards them for several years past. At a previous session, when a bill was brought in to equalise the pay of the officers of the army and navy, it had been expected that the bill would become a law; but, instead of that, a bill passed to increase the pay of the officers of the navy only, leaving out the officers of the army, and thus discouraging the latter from believing that they had any thing to expect at the hands of Congress.

The principle of equalising the pay of the army and navy (said Mr. W.) was both just and equitable; and the passage of such a law would have been attended with the best consequences to the officers of both these branches of the service. Their pay being equal, they would be able to act on duty together without any lurking feeling of injustice or jealousy; and he hoped that, at no distant date, such a bill would receive the approbation of Congress.

In conclusion, Mr. W. remarked that, as he had heretofore raised his voice in favor of the Military Academy at West Point, and as he had not the slightest apprehension as to the result of any scrutiny into its affairs, he was willing that the committee should go there. He believed that their visit would be productive of good; and he would tell them now, that if they should discover any abuses, he would go all lengths with them in the work of reform. But the abolition of the institution was an idea which he could not for a moment entertain.

Mr. JARVIS said he did not rise to enter into any debate, his object being rather to arrest it. He might have a few words to say hereafter, but he moved now to lay the resolution on the table.

Mr. VANDERPOEL said that, as all the attraction seemed at present to be in the other end of the building, he would move for a call of the House; and, on that motion, he called for the yeas and nays; which the House refused to order.

And the question on the motion for a call of the House was then taken, and decided in the negative. So the House refused to order the call.

Mr. VANDERPOEL then called for the yeas and nays on the motion to lay the resolution on the table; which were ordered, and, being taken, were: Yeas 86, nays 77.

So the resolution was laid on the table.

EXECUTIVE ADMINISTRATION.

The House resumed the consideration of the resolution heretofore offered by Mr. Wise, proposing the appointment of a select committee to inquire into the administration of the executive departments, together with the amendment offered thereto by Mr. D. J. PEARCE, proposing to confine the inquiry to specific acts of male-administration.

Mr. LANE addressed the House for upwards of an hour, in opposition to Mr. Wise's resolution.

And then, on motion of Mr. HOWELL,

THURSDAY, DECEMBER 22.

CUMBERLAND ROAD.

The first business in order was the resolution of the State of Illinois, in relation to the locating of the national road in Illinois, so as to cause it to pass through Alton, presented on a former day by Mr. REYNOLDS, of that State.

Mr. REYNOLDS rose and addressed the House as follows:

Mr. Speaker: I am sorry that I am compelled, by a sense of duty, to address the House on this subject, which, I fear, is not very interesting to my friends, the members of this House; and I cannot promise them, in my remarks, any thing like eloquence or oratory, that will be entertaining to them. This is a subject of great interest and importance to the whole State of Illinois, and particularly to the district which I have the honor to represent on this floor. Its interest to the people is the reason I now address you. The preamble and resolutions now under consideration were adopted by the General Assembly of the State by a unanimous vote. The State has assumed the principles and doctrines of State rights, which I consider are constitutional and correct, and such as can be maintained and demonstrated on a proper exposition of the constitution of our Government. Without further comment or preface, I will read the preamble and resolutions which passed the Legislature of the State of Illinois by a unanimous vote.

"Whereas it is the opinion of the Legislature of the State of Illinois, now in session, that the route which the national road should pursue, if extended so as to cross the Mississippi river at the town of Alton, would be in entire accordance with its ultimate destination, the capital of the State of Missouri; would be more advantageous to the commercial and agricultural interests of this State, and afford to her inhabitants, and those of her sister States, a more direct and convenient chain of intercommunication than any other route; and whereas the passage of said road across the Mississippi river at St. Louis would not only be highly detrimental to the prosperity of this State, but in violation of her just pretensions and of her rights of sovereignty, contrary to the avowed policy of the General Government, and in open defiance of those principles of even-handed justice and impartiality which have characterized her dealings with other States, in relation to this matter:

"Therefore, be it resolved by the General Assembly of the State of Illinois, That the consent of the State of Illinois is hereby given to the Federal Government to extend the national road through the territory of said State, so as to cross the Mississippi river at the town of Alton, in said State, and at no other point.

"Resolved, That our Senators in Congress be instructed, and our Representatives requested, to use their best exertions to procure the passage of a law authorizing the survey of the route from Vandalia to Jefferson city, by the way of Alton, and for the continuation of the national road upon said route."

It will be perceived, by every member of this House, that this resolution presents a subject of much importance, and one on which various opinions have been entertained. This subject being new, and of difficult solution, I have the same pleasure in presenting it to this learned and intelligent assembly as the celebrated personage of antiquity had in defending himself before King Agrippa. St. Paul said that he was "happy to have the privilege to address a judge who was learned in all the laws and customs of the Jews." So do "I think myself happy" to have the honor to present this subject before an assembly that are intelligent, and learned in the laws and constitution of their country. It is a principle acknowledged by all constitutional lawyers and constitutional writers, that the Congress of the United States possess no power of action further than is expressly given them by the constitution; and, on an attentive and careful examination of that instrument, it will be found that there exists no power in Congress to force on a State such improvements as are contemplated by this national road.

I would ask any gentleman in this House, if he would vote for an improvement of the country, such as the national road is, contrary to the express will and consent of the State in which the road was to be located? I do not believe there can be a case found in the history of this Government, where the General Government has forced on a State, contrary to the will and consent of the State, a road, or any such improvement. The United States possess the power to make all necessary roads for her military operations. This power arises from her exclusive and constitutional authority over the subject of war and all its consequences.

The national road which is now under consideration is not pretended to be a military road, or in any manner connected with the military operations of the Government. The constitution of the United States expressly authorizes Congress "to establish post offices and post roads." Congress, having the constitutional authority and jurisdiction over this subject, must, as a necessary consequence, have the power to "establish" post routes or post roads. The Congress, at their last session, established a great many post roads all over the Union. This is the establishment which, in my opinion, is contemplated by the constitution, and not the making of a road such as the national road is. It would not be seriously contended by any one, that, under the provisions of the constitution on this subject, Congress would be bound, or would have the constitutional competency, to make and cut out a road wherever they establish a post route. The national road is, in fact, no more a post road than it is a military road; and, consequently, the General Government, under the provisions of the constitution, have no power to force it on the States.

If Congress possess the power, without the consent of the States through which this road passes, to make and open it in the States, then it must follow, as a matter of necessity, that Congress also possess the power to keep these roads in repair; and, in order to do this, they must establish toll gates and toll collectors on them. They must also possess the jurisdiction and control over them; and, consequently, must establish courts, and appoint officers, to enforce the acts of Congress, in the exercise of their jurisdiction over them. If Congress have the power, without the consent of the States, to make these roads, they must exercise all the jurisdiction and power above enumerated, in exclusion of the State authorities. This must be the necessary consequence, if they have the power, in the first instance, to make the roads. I believe that there is no American citizen who would be willing to see the United States assume and exercise the exclusive jurisdiction and control over these national improvements, and deprive the States of their constitutional sovereignty and rights within the limits of their own territory.

I have heard intelligent gentlemen contend, that if the United States had the power to make the national road at all, they would have it as well without as with the consent of the States through which the road may pass.

I consider this position to be without foundation, and untenable. A State has the power and right to admit any individual or set of men to expend their money in the State, in such way or manner as the State may think proper and right. We see companies frequently incorporated by State authority to make roads, canals, and such improvements. They act under the authority of the State. They may be considered the agents or servants of the State, as they act under the control and laws of the State, and not by their own authority. In the same manner, when the State gives her consent to the General Government to make a road within the limits of the State, the United States acts not by its own authority, but by the power and authority delegated to it by the State Government. The General Government act under the authority of the State, and, like all other agents, can not transcend the power given.

This view of the subject is demonstrated by an act of the General Assembly of the State of Maryland, passed in November, 1802, which is in the following words, to wit:

"That this State do hereby give and grant their full approbation and consent that the Congress of the United States may appropriate, towards repairing and keeping in repair the post roads, or any one or more of them, within this State, such sum or sums of money as they in their wisdom may deem right, and to lay out and apply the same to said purpose, in any manner they by law direct: Provided, That nothing herein contained shall extend, or may be construed to extend, to authorize Congress to pass any law for the changing the direction of the roads, or any of them, as now established, or to authorize them to pass a law for the opening of a new road."

The above-recited act gives a construction to the constitutional power of Congress, and demonstrates the position that Congress is governed in its action on this subject by the authority of the State Government.

This view of the subject is also fortified by Congress transferring the national road to the States east of the Ohio, through which the road passes. Congress, by this act, disclaims the jurisdiction and exclusive control over this road, and transfers all her claim to it to the respective States in which it is located. This is an acknowledgment that the General Government had not the power or jurisdiction over this improvement, to the exclusion of the State Governments. It is a principle, acknowledged by all, that the construction and exposition given to a law or to a constitution, at or near the time the law or constitution was made, is of greater force and validity than a construction given at any other time.

In 1806, which is not a great length of time after the constitution of the United States was adopted, an act of Congress passed on this very subject, and gave a construction to that instrument. This is the first act which was passed on the subject, and it is the act that established the Cumberland or national road.

I will read to you, Mr. Speaker, a part of the act of Congress, which requires the President of the United States to obtain the consent of the State through which this road was to be located. Commissioners were to be appointed by this act; and, on their report, the duty of the President is prescribed in the following act of Congress, to wit:

"Which report the President is hereby authorized to accept or reject, in the whole or in part. If he accepts, he is hereby further authorized and requested to pursue such measures as in his opinion shall be proper, to obtain consent, for making the road, of the State or States through which the same has been laid out; which consent being obtained, he is further authorized to take prompt and effectual measures to cause said road to be made through the whole distance, or in any part or parts of the same he shall judge most conducive to the public good, having reference to the sum appropriated for the purpose."

In the execution of the above-recited act of Congress, and in the performance of his duty under it, President Jefferson addressed the following message to Congress:

"To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States:

"In execution of the act of the last session of Congress, entitled 'An act to regulate the laying out and making a road from Cumberland, in the State of Maryland, to the State of Ohio,' I appointed Thomas Moore, of Maryland, Joseph Kerr, of Ohio, and Eli Williams, of Maryland, commissioners to lay out the said road, and to perform the other duties assigned to them by the act. The progress which they made in the execution of the work, during the last session, will appear in their report now communicated to Congress. On the receipt of it, I took measures to obtain consent for making the road, of the States of Pennsylvania, Maryland, and Virginia, through which the commissioners proposed to lay it out. I have received acts of the Legislatures of Maryland and Virginia, giving the consent desired; that of Pennsylvania has the subject still under consideration, as is supposed. Until I receive full consent to a free choice of route through the whole distance, I have thought it safest neither to accept nor reject, finally, the partial report of the commissioners. Some matters suggested in the report belong exclusively to the Legislature.

TH. JEFFERSON.

JANUARY 31, 1807."

It is almost useless to observe that no person ever stood higher for splendid talents, and for a complete and perfect knowledge of our constitution and the nature of our Government, than President Jefferson did; and he deemed it necessary to have the "full consent" of the States "to a free choice of the route, through the whole distance," before he could cause the road to be made.

Mr. Speaker, I will trouble the House with only a few of the acts of the State Governments in which this road was located.

The following is an act of the General Assembly of Maryland, which passed 4th January, 1807, and fully recognises the principle that the General Government has no power to make the improvement without the "consent" of the State:

"Whereas a law passed the Congress of the United States on the 29th of March, 1806, directing the laying out of a road from Cumberland, on the Potomac river, to the Ohio; and the consent of this State being necessary to the opening of the same, so far as it may run within her limits, therefore,

"Be it enacted by the General Assembly of Maryland, That it shall be lawful, and the full and entire consent of the State of Maryland is hereby given to the opening and improving the same; and the President of the United States is hereby authorized to cause the said road to be laid out, opened, and improved, in such way and manner as by the before-recited act of Congress is required and directed."

An act passed the General Assembly of the State of Pennsylvania on the 9th April, 1807, on this subject, and is as follows, to wit:

"That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized to cause so much of the said road as will be in this State to be opened so far as it may be necessary the same should pass through this State, and to cause the said road to be made, regulated, and completed, within the limits and according to the intent and meaning of the before-recited act of Congress in relation thereto."

Mr. Speaker, I will not trouble the House by reading any of the acts or resolutions of the General Assemblies of the States of Virginia, Ohio, or Indiana, through which this road passes. It will be found, on examination, that the consent of all the States, from one end of this road to the other, has been given to the General Government to construct the road, before the United States commenced it. It seems to me there cannot exist a doubt in the mind of any one that will examine the subject attentively, and see the course of the General Government and of the States also on this subject, that Congress has not the constitutional power to force an improvement of this character on any State.

If Congress assume this power, and exercise it, State rights and State sovereignty might be prostrated. If Congress can force a road on a State four rods wide, it can force into a State one of forty miles wide, and must of necessity exercise exclusive jurisdiction over it. This would be unreasonable, and destructive to our system of government. It would have a tendency to the formation of a consolidated Government, which would destroy State rights and State Governments.

The President, in his late message of December, 1836, recognises this principle where he says that "The great struggle was begun against that latitudinarian construction of the constitution, which authorizes the unlimited appropriation of the revenue of the Union to internal improvement within the States; tending to invest in the hands and place under the control of the General Government all the principal roads and canals of the country, in violation of State rights and in derogation of State authority."

This principle being demonstrated, that Congress has no power to make these works without the "consent" of the State in which they are located, the necessary consequence is—growing out of the above resolution—that the national road must cross the Mississippi river at Alton, in the State of Illinois. If the road does not cross the river at Alton, the consent of the State is given to locate it "at no other point." It is proper and right to mention that there is a contest between the States of Illinois and Missouri about the location of this road. The State of Illinois, as I have before remarked, is unanimous in her resolution to locate it at Alton; and the representatives of the people of Missouri wish it located so as to cross the Mississippi at St. Louis, in that State.

The people of Illinois entertain no unfriendly feelings towards the State of Missouri or the city of St. Louis. We are proud of the growth and prosperity of the State and of their city, but we are not so friendly to them as to advance their interests to the disparagement and destruction of our own rights and interests. We do "not love Caesar less, but Rome more."

We, the people of Illinois, consider it our duty to advance our own happiness and interest, when it is not to do an injury or wrong to the State of Missouri or to the United States. We do not wish to injure St. Louis, but we are anxious to advance our own State and Alton.

At a recent election, under a statute law of the State of Illinois, a vote was taken for the location of the seat of Government of the State, and Alton received more votes than any other place; by which proceeding it is almost certain that Alton will become the seat of Government for the State; and as the policy of the States through which the national road passes, and that also of the General Government, is to locate it so as to pass the seats of the State Governments, this policy will, I hope, be extended to Illinois as well as to other States. Alton is one of the most flourishing and commercial towns in the State of Illinois. I am informed that it and its environs contain a population of four or five thousand souls; and I know it is rather increasing in population, business, and importance. And although Alton may not contain as great a population as St. Louis, yet there is in the State of Illinois an immense number of people more than in the State of Missouri, which ought to be a strong argument in favor of the State of Illinois.

Mr. Speaker, it is almost unnecessary for me to state to this House, at this time, that the national road has been located no further west than to Vandalia, the seat of Government of the State of Illinois; and the resolution before us gives the consent of the State to continue it in that State to Alton, towards its ultimate destination, Jefferson city, in the State of Missouri; and, judging from the best information I can obtain, the route by Alton, from Vandalia to Jefferson city, will be found, on actual survey, to be the best and shortest, for the continuation of the road.

If this resolution gave the consent of the State to cross the Mississippi river at a point entirely out of the direction from Vandalia to Jefferson city, then I would say it was unreasonable, and ought not to be urged on the consideration of this House. On such occasion, I should regret to find myself advocating a course of policy so absurd and unjust. But when I am clearly satisfied that the route by Alton is the nearest and best from Vandalia to Jefferson city, and that the General Government will take into consideration the will, interest, and "consent" of the State, in the location of this road, I feel a conscious rectitude in my course, and will pursue it, "uncaring of consequences."

I consider it my duty to pursue this course at this session of Congress, in conformity to the resolution of the General Assembly, and in accordance to the voice of the people, expressed in a meeting had on the occasion. The proceedings of this meeting were printed and laid on the table of each member.

Having finished my remarks on this resolution, I move to refer it to the Committee on Roads and Canals.

Mr. HARRISON, of Missouri, inquired of the gentleman from Illinois if his motion to refer was intended also to embrace instructions to the committee to report a bill in pursuance of the resolutions presented; because, if so, Mr. H. wished to have an opportunity of replying to the gentleman.

Mr. REYNOLDS replied that his motion did not embrace instructions.

The motion to refer was then agreed to.

TEXAS.

The following message was received from the President of the United States, by the hands of ANDREW JACKSON, JR., his private secretary:

To the House of Representatives U. S.

During the last session, information was given to Congress, by the Executive, that measures had been taken to ascertain "the political, military, and civil condition of Texas." I now submit, for your consideration, extracts from the report of the agent who had been appointed to collect it, relative to the condition of that country.

No steps have been taken by the Executive towards the acknowledgment of the independence of Texas; and the whole subject would have been left without further remark, on the information now given to Congress, were it not that the two Houses, at their last session, acting separately, passed resolutions "that the independence of Texas ought to be acknowledged by the United States, whenever satisfactory information should be received that it had in successful operation a civil Government, capable of performing the duties and fulfilling the obligations of an independent Power." This mark of interest in the question of the independence of Texas, and indication of the views of Congress, make it proper that I should, somewhat in detail, present the considerations that have governed the Executive in continuing to occupy the ground previously taken in the contest between Mexico and Texas.

The acknowledgment of a new State as independent, and entitled to a place in the family of nations, is at all times an act of great delicacy and responsibility; but more especially so when such State has forcibly separated itself from another, of which it had formed an integral part, and which still claims dominion over it. A premature recognition, under these circumstances, if no, looked upon as justifiable cause of war, is always liable to be regarded as a proof of an unfriendly spirit to one of the contending parties. All questions relative to the government of foreign nations, whether of the old or the new world, have been treated by the United States as questions of fact only; and our predecessors have cautiously abstained from deciding upon them until the clearest evidence was in their possession, to enable them not only to decide correctly, but to shield their decisions from every unworthy imputation. In all the contests that have arisen out of the revolutions of France, out of the disputes relating to the crowns of Portugal and Spain, out of the revolutionary movements in those kingdoms, out of the separation of the American possessions of both from the European Governments, and out of the numerous and constantly occurring struggles for dominion in Spanish America, so wisely consistent with our just principles has been the action of our Government, that we have, under the most critical circumstances, avoided all censure, and encountered no other evil than that produced by a transient estrangement of good will in those against whom we have been, by force of evidence, compelled to decide.

It has thus been made known to the world that the uniform policy and practice of the United States is, to avoid all interference in disputes which merely relate to the internal government of other nations, and eventually to recognise the authority of the prevailing party, without reference to our particular interests and views, or to the merits of the original controversy. Public opinion here is so firmly established and well understood in favor of this policy, that no serious disagreement has ever arisen among ourselves in relation to it, although brought under review in a variety of forms, and at periods when the minds of the people were greatly excited by the agitation of topics purely domestic in their character. Nor has any deliberate inquiry ever been instituted in Congress, or in any of our legislative bodies, as to whom belonged the power of originally recognising a new State—a power the exercise of which is equivalent, under some circumstances, to a declaration of war—a power nowhere expressly delegated, and only granted in the constitution, as it is necessarily involved in some of the great powers given to Congress; in that given to the President and Senate to form treaties with foreign Powers, and to appoint ambassadors and other public ministers; and in that conferred upon the President to receive ministers from foreign nations.

In the preamble to the resolution of the House of Representatives, it is distinctly intimated that the expediency of recognising the independence of Texas should be left to the decision of Congress. In this view, on the ground of expediency, I am disposed to concur; and do not, therefore, consider it necessary to express any opinion as to the strict constitutional right of the Executive, either apart from or in conjunction with the Senate, over the subject. It is to be presumed that on no future occasion will a dispute arise, as none has heretofore occurred, between the Executive and Legislature, in the exercise of the power of recognition. It will always be considered consistent with the spirit of the constitution, and most safe, that it should be exercised, when probably leading to war, with a previous understanding with that body by whom war can alone be declared, and by whom all the provisions for sustaining its perils must be furnished. Its submission to Congress, which represents in one of its branches the States of this Union, and in the other the people of the United States, where there may be reasonable ground to apprehend so grave a consequence, would certainly afford the fullest satisfaction to our own country, and a perfect guarantee to all other nations; of the justice and prudence of the measures which might be adopted.

In making these suggestions, it is not my purpose to relieve myself from the responsibility of expressing my own opinions of the course the interests of our country prescribe, and its honor permits us to follow.

It is scarcely to be imagined that a question of this character could be presented, in relation to which it would be more difficult for the United States to avoid exciting the suspicion and jealousy of other Powers, and maintain their established character for fair and impartial dealing. But on this, as on every trying occasion, safety is to be found in a rigid adherence to principle.

In the contest between Spain and her revolted colonies we stood aloof, and waited not only until the ability of the new States to protect themselves was fully established, but until the danger of their being again subjugated had entirely passed away. Then, and not till then, were they recognised. Such was our course in regard to Mexico herself. The same policy was observed in all the disputes growing out of the separation into distinct Governments of those Spanish American States who began or carried on the contest with the parent country, united under one form of government. We acknowledged the separate independence of New Grenada, of Venezuela, and of Ecuador, only after their independent existence was no longer a subject of dispute, or was actually acquiesced in by those with whom they had been previously united. It is true that, with regard to Texas, the civil authority of Mexico has been expelled, its invading army defeated, and the chief of the republic himself captured, and all present power to control the newly organized Government of Texas annihilated within its confines. But, on the other hand, there is, in appearance at least, an immense disparity of physical force on the side of Mexico. The Mexican republic, under another Executive, is rallying its forces under a new leader, and menacing a fresh invasion to recover its lost dominion.

Upon the issue of this threatened invasion, the independence of Texas may be considered as suspended; and were there nothing peculiar in the relative situation of the United States and Texas, our acknowledgment of its independence at such a crisis could scarcely be regarded as consistent with that prudent reserve with which we have heretofore held ourselves bound to treat all similar questions. But there are circumstances in the relations of the two countries which require us to act, on this occasion, with even more than our wonted caution. Texas was once claimed as a part of our property, and there are those among our citizens who, always reluctant to abandon that claim, cannot but regard with solicitude the prospect of the reunion of the territory to this country. A large proportion of its civilized inhabitants are emigrants from the United States; speak the same language with ourselves; cherish the same principles, political and religious; and are bound to many of our citizens by ties of friendship and kindred blood; and, more than all, it is known that the people of that country have instituted the same form of government with our own; and have, since the close of your last session, openly resolved, on the acknowledgment by us of their independence, to seek admission into the Union as one of the Federal States. This last circumstance is a matter of peculiar delicacy, and forces upon us considerations of the gravest character. The title of Texas to the territory she claims is identified with her independence; she asks us to acknowledge that title to the territory, with an avowed design to treat immediately of its transfer to the United States. It becomes us to beware of a too early movement, as it might subject us, however unjustly, to the imputation of seeking to establish the claim of our neighbors to a territory, with a view to its subsequent acquisition by ourselves. Prudence, therefore, seems to dictate that we should still stand aloof, and maintain our present attitude, if not until Mexico itself, or one of the great foreign Powers, shall recognise the independence of the new Government, at least until the lapse of time or the course of events shall have proved, beyond cavil or dispute, the ability of the people of that country to maintain their separate sovereignty, and to uphold the Government constituted by them. Neither of the contending parties can justly complain of this course. By pursuing it, we are but carrying out the long-established policy of our Government—a policy which has secured to us respect and influence abroad, and inspired confidence at home.

Having thus discharged my duty, by presenting with simplicity and directness the views which, after much reflection, I have been led to take of this important subject, I have only to add the expression of my confidence that, if Congress shall differ with me upon it, their judgment will be the result of dispassionate, prudent, and wise deliberation; with the assurance that, during the short time I shall continue connected with the Government, I shall promptly and cordially unite with you in such measures as may be deemed best fitted to increase the prosperity and perpetuate the peace of our favored country.

ANDREW JACKSON.

WASHINGTON, December 21, 1836.

The reading of the message having been concluded, Mr. HOWARD moved that the same, with the accompanying documents, be referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and that they be printed; which motion prevailed.

Mr. BRIGGS then moved that 10,000 extra copies of the message and documents be printed.

Mr. D. J. PEARCE moved 20,000.

Under the rule, the motion would lie over one day, but, by the unanimous consent of the House, it was now taken into consideration.

Mr. PICKENS expressed himself favorable to the motion to print an extra number of copies, and took occasion to say that, in referring the same to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, he hoped it had been distinctly understood that a report was to be had at as early a period as possible. He had no objection to the reference to that committee, for he considered and recognised it as representing the dominant party who were about to rule the destinies of this nation. The subject was a most important one, and he hoped the committee would assume the responsibility of issuing a report as early as might possibly suit their convenience.

Mr. E. WHITTLESEY objected to the printing of 20,000 copies. He had been in hopes that, at this session, the House was about to commence its duties with a determination of bringing the expenses of printing, and the other expenses of the Government, to something like what they were ten or twelve years ago; and, with this view, he had been disposed, at the time that 15,000 copies of the documents accompanying the annual message of the President had been ordered, to submit to the House whether it was expedient or proper to go to that expense for the purpose of circulating those documents.

Heretofore, on another occasion, he had remarked that, previous to the year 1829, there were never more than five thousand copies of any public document ordered to be printed. Such, he believed, was the usual number. At the last session of Congress, the House had ordered some twenty thousand copies of the President's message and the accompanying documents to be printed; and at what period were they circulated over the country? Not until spring; and he questioned whether all of them were even delivered then. The House had, at this session, ordered fifteen thousand copies of the message; and how many of that number had been delivered to the members of the House? Not more than six—he thought not more than five. And these very documents had now been returned here, printed by the country newspapers, before all the copies ordered by this House had been received.

He was desirous, on this as on all other occasions, to lay all important documents before the people, and he cared not how widely they were disseminated, when there was any apparent necessity for so doing. In such cases he was disposed to go to the utmost extent in disseminating information; but he drew a wide distinction between supporting a public press and disseminating information among the people.

He agreed with other gentlemen, that this was an important document; and if it were of so lengthy a character as not to admit of its general republication amongst the newspapers of the country, he was willing, so far as the expense was concerned, to vote any sum to communicate the information it contained. But could it be doubted that, before a tenth part of these 20,000 copies were delivered, every member would receive papers from his own district containing the same document? It seemed to him that the House ought to come to some understanding on this subject of printing; and that they ought not, because a document was important, to print so large an extra number of copies, when it was considered that the information was not disseminated through them, but by means of the newspaper press. He hoped the House would bring the expenses of this department back to what they had formerly been. He was willing to vote for 10,000 copies, but for no higher number.

Mr. D. J. PEARCE, in replying to the gentleman from Ohio, remarked that, about two years ago, some fifty thousand copies had been printed of an oration which had been delivered by an honorable member of that House, [Mr. Adams,] on a very important subject; he alluded to the Eulogy on Lafayette. Probably delicacy should prevent his (Mr. P.'s) saying that that was a work of the first order of talent, and of sterling merit.

He was not aware that any man who voted for the printing of that vast number of copies had been rebuked or upbraided by his constituents; but that was a subject referring to things which had taken place many years ago; to the actions of a distinguished individual, now passed away from the theatre of human affairs, and to actions performed by him in the war of the Revolution. The matter, however, which was now submitted to the consideration of the House, was to be taken in a prospective view; it was to be taken with reference to future events in this country; and the House was to view this document with an eye to things that were to come hereafter. What document could be more important, or where could there be one to which their attention ought to be more anxiously directed?

Speaking in reference to those whom he immediately represented, he would say that there was not a man, woman, or child over twelve years of age, in the State from which he came, who had not exercised some mind upon the important subject to which this document had reference; and the question now was, whether the information which this message contained should be communicated to them or not. It was a subject in relation to which, whatever might have been the notions of the members of that House at the last session of Congress, whatever might have been the feelings of gentlemen representing certain portions of the Union, there had been a change of opinion, an alteration of sentiment. And whatever might have been the surmises and conjectures as to what would be the course of the distinguished individual who now filled the executive chair, he (Mr. P.) presumed that those surmises and conjectures would now be found to have been without foundation. He submitted to the House, then, that this was no ordinary subject; that it was not one of common importance; it was, indeed, of more importance than most of the subjects which had been transmitted to Congress for its consideration during the present session; and if it was so, should they withhold from their constituents the stand which had been taken by the Executive of the United States? It was not for the purpose of petting a printer, or supporting a particular press, that he (Mr. P.) was desirous of increasing the number; that was a mere bagatelle, compared to the dissemination of the information contained in the document, and the stand which had been taken by this Government in relation to the affairs with Texas, so far, at least, as that stand could be inferred from the document before the House. Was the House to square its notions now by what its notions were in 1829? Was the country now what it was at that period? Had not our progress been onward? Had there been no expansion of settlement? no increase of population? But, independent of all such considerations, in 1829, for want of the facilities which existed at this day, six weeks would have been consumed in the transmission of information which could now be communicated in three or four days; then, indeed, these documents might have lain on the members' tables as worthless lumber. But now, by means of railroads, steamboats, and express mails, information, which could not then be communicated in six weeks, can now be sent from one end of the republic to the other in a few days. View the document prospectively, or in any other light, there was no subject at this particular juncture of so much importance; and should that House, looking merely to the expense, cause only five or six thousand copies to be printed, thus distributing the document only to one individual in every town or village? Whereas, by printing twenty thousand, it would go to some four or five persons, speaking, at least, of some of the States, in every town, village, and hamlet. He contended, then, that the ordinary rule applied to the printing of public documents was not applicable to this case. It might, indeed, be said that the newspapers would publish the document; but it was one of that character which most persons would wish to put on file for preservation, not only for their own benefit, but for that of those who may succeed them, as containing the views of the President of the United States at this day. Mr. P. hoped that the motion to print twenty thousand copies would prevail.

Mr. HIOAR expressed his accordance with the general views expressed by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. E. WHITLSEY,] on the subject of printing. But he did not concur with that gentleman in the opinion that those views should be applied to the present case. He (Mr. H.) considered that a document on so important a subject, and coming from such a source, should be disseminated as widely as possible.

The subject had been treated by the President in a manner highly satisfactory to his (Mr. H.'s) views. The statement contained in the document should be in the hands of every man in the country. It deserved more than a cursory reading; it deserved to be printed in a form suited to its permanent preservation. He was in favor of printing the highest number proposed, and was even willing to vote for a greater number than that.

Mr. THOMPSON, of South Carolina, said he was not opposed to the printing of the proposed number. He was willing that the views of those who approved of the message of the President should be given to the world at the public expense.

He was not at all surprised at the number proposed to be printed. He must rather commend the moderation of those opposed to him. He should not have been surprised at a proposal to print one hundred thousand, nor, indeed, to print it on satin, which had been heretofore done (not by this House) with a kindred document, and one produced by the same influence which has dictated this message. Nor was he surprised at the hosannahs with which this message had been received, the joy and exultation which he had seen manifested, by gentlemen from a certain section, the rapturous plaudits, the enthusiastic exclamations, "Oh! righteous judge, a second Daniel come to judgment," by lips unused to such accents. It was to be expected, sir, from that strange, unnatural, and disastrous (at least to the South and West) conjunction upon this occasion of hitherto most antagonist elements. He had no objection either to please those who had a taste for such things, and whose interest and whose vocation it is—and their vocation, because it is their interest—to pronounce eulogies upon the President. He had only risen to-day to say, that with the united power of sectional feelings, and the influence of the name and popularity of the President upon their side, that it seemed to him nothing more than fair to ask of gentlemen not to seek occasion on a proposition to print, which no one opposed, further to forestall public opinion upon this subject. Upon a fit occasion, when the subject came fairly before the House on the report of the Committee on Foreign Relations, he had somewhat to say upon the other side of this question.

Mr. E. WHITTLESEY, with a view to consume no further time in debate, said he would withdraw his opposition to the proposed number of 20,000 copies.

Mr. CRAIG concurred in the general opinion expressed by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. WHITTLESEY;] but, considering the great importance of the subject, &c., and the consequent necessity that existed for giving the document the most extensive dissemination, he was in favor of the motion to print 20,000 copies.

Mr. WISE said that, like his friend from South Carolina, [Mr. THOMSON,] he would vote for the largest number of copies to be printed; but, like him also, he could not say he would thus vote because he approved the message. He could not say either that he approved or disapproved of the message; and why? Because he could not, like some gentlemen, judge of its merits by instinct. He was not unfavorably impressed with it, so far as he could judge by listening to the reading of it by the Clerk; but one thing he would say in advance, that if, under the semblance of great moderation, wisdom, and prudence, the object of this message was to delay and postpone the hour when we should give our aid, by the light of our countenance, to a people struggling for human rights and civil liberty, he was opposed to its object and policy "to tota celo." The message involved a subject of the deepest interest, important in every aspect; important not only in the light in which it is usually considered, as touching our foreign relations, but important as it will affect our domestic political relations. Gentlemen are well aware that the question of recognising the independence of Texas will, whenever it comes, divide a party whose motto at this time is, and for some time to come will be, "don't divide." This question will divide many of both parties who are now united. However politic it might be for parties to remain united, he was not for postponing the hour of recognising the claims of Texas to freedom a moment beyond what real and not affected wisdom and prudence might require. He meant, however, only to say that, by voting for the greatest number of copies of the message to be printed, he, for one, did not mean to give that message the sanction of his humble approbation until he had read it, studied it, understood precisely its objects and designs, and until he could appreciate its immediate and ultimate effects.

Mr. HOWARD expressed his concurrence with the gentleman from Rhode Island, who made the motion to print 20,000 copies of this document. He considered there ought to be a large number printed for distribution among the people of the country. He also concurred in opinion with the gentleman from Virginia, that it was impossible, from hearing the message read, to form an opinion as to its merits. It asserted a principle most important, and required to be acted on with great deliberation; he was therefore in favor of distributing it to the people of the country, so that they might have an opportunity of forming an opinion thereon.

Mr. BOON observed that circumstances very frequently altered cases. He was astonished to hear the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WHITTLESEY] object to the printing of this very important document. It would be recollected that a few sessions back, when a proposition was made to print a certain Post Office report, the printing of a solitary number of which would cost more than a thousand copies of this message, that gentlemen did not then object to printing large numbers of the document. Now, when an extra number of this document was wanting, gentlemen said it would be published in the newspapers. Mr. B. said, however, that it must be recollected that a large number of the tax payers of this country were not subscribers to newspapers; therefore it was necessary that extra numbers should be printed for distribution. He only regretted that the gentleman had not moved to print 40,000.

The question was then taken on the motion to print 20,000 extra copies, which was agreed to.

MINT OF THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. CAMBRELENG asked the consent of the House to take up the "mint bill." He hoped the request would be assented to, for it was highly important that the bill should be passed by the first of the year, inasmuch as it was proposed to take effect from and after the 1st day of January next, and this was the last day of the present week on which it could be acted on.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, objecting,

Mr. CAMBRELENG moved a suspension of the rule for the purpose; which motion prevailed, by a vote of 89 to 37.

On motion of the same gentleman, the House then went into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. MUELENBERG in the chair,) and took up the bill, the title of which is as follows: "An act establishing a mint, and regulating the coins of the United States."

Mr. CAMBRELENG moved the substitute heretofore reported, which was the same in substance as the bill reported last year, with a few verbal alterations.

The bill, as amended, having been read, and some further verbal amendments agreed to, on motion Mr. CAMBRELENG, after some explanatory remarks from that gentleman in relation to the copper coin—

Mr. ADAMS, referring to the intimation of Mr. CAMBRELENG that it was necessary to pass this bill before the 1st of January, said that if the bill had proposed to repeal all the laws of the United States, and it had been required that such a bill should be passed within a week's time, he could not have been more surprised than he was at hearing this bill read, in connexion with the precipitate proceeding proposed in regard to it. The subject of the bill was, he said, entirely too important to be disposed of in this summary mode. It was a bill to repeal all laws concerning the coinage of the money of the United States, and establish a system different from that which now exists; which might be all right,

Mint of the United States.

but which it was necessary should be closely examined before it was acted upon. In reply to a remark of Mr. CAMBRELENG, that the bill was merely a compilation of existing laws and regulations in regard to the mint, Mr. ADAMS said that the very first thing that struck his ear on hearing the bill read was a provision that hereafter the weight of the silver dollar should be 412½ grains. Now, by the existing law, the established weight of that coin was 416 grains. Here, then, was a debasement of the coin; and debasement of the coin had always been regarded as one of the greatest, most important, (and often most immoral) acts a Government can perform. What was all this for? He wished to know. It might be a very proper operation; but, if it was, it was not in this hasty and inconsiderate manner that it ought to be effected. As to the gold coins, he could not from recollection say whether the weight proposed was the same as the present legal rate; but, as to the copper coin, the standard of which by the existing law was fixed at 208 grains, this bill proposed to reduce it to 140 grains! Such a reduction of the actual value of the coin would be not only injurious to the mass of poor people who chiefly used the coin, but was in every other way objectionable. It would subject the people who use this coin to all the disadvantage with which Ireland was menaced by Wood's copper coin; and if gentlemen desired particular information on that subject, he advised them to read the Draper's Letters, and apply them to this case. For his part, (Mr. A. said,) he did not remember of any thing equal to this sweeping measure, unless it was the scheme of Charles XII, of Sweden, who made copper coins of less than the specific weight of our cent, and then issued them to his army as of the value of a dollar. Debase your coin! (said he;) you have no right to do it. To do so is to rob those who are in possession of it. If, in consequence of the change of the alloy, the dollar would (as was alleged) remain of the same value as now, why make the change in the weight at all? One of the advantages of the present dollar is, that it is of the weight and value of the Spanish milled dollar, and therefore affords a facility to all who deal in dollars by weight. Now, the dollar is not only a part of the currency, but it is also an article of merchandise; and, as long as our dollar is of the same weight and value of the Spanish dollar, the value and weight of the bag of American dollars and of the bag of Spanish dollars being known all over the world to be the same, they pass at the same value all over the world by weight; and to change the weight would therefore affect seriously the commerce of the country. By these and similar arguments Mr. A. endeavored to satisfy the Committee of the Whole of the impropriety of precipitancy in a matter of so much delicacy and consequence as the subject of this bill.

In the course of these remarks of Mr. ADAMS, occasion was taken by Mr. CAMBRELENG to express his surprise that time should now be required by the gentleman from Massachusetts to examine this subject, inasmuch as this bill was substantially the same as one reported as long ago as at the last session of Congress, though not then acted upon. The bill did not (he said) propose to change the value of the silver coin by a single sou. Mr. C. also made some further explanations, concluding by saying that if Mr. A. would allow the bill to go through the committee to-day, he would himself then move its postponement to Tuesday next, allowing time to gentlemen in the interval to inform themselves of all the details of the bill.

Mr. ADAMS, however, said he, for one, could not consent to move a step further in this bill, which he had not before seen or heard read, without first having time to read and examine it. He moved, therefore, that the committee now rise.

Mr. JARVIS took occasion to state that, having carefully examined the subject, he could satisfy gentlemen that in the proposed composition of the dollar the amount of pure silver was the same as in the present dollar, and that the proposed value of the gold coin was the same as now.

The committee divided on the motion to rise, and the votes being equal, (65 to 65,) the question was determined in the negative by the casting vote of the chairman, [Mr. MUHLBERG.]

Mr. INGERSOLL, who appeared to be perfectly familiar with the details as well as the principles of the bill, (having been one of the committee who reported it,) expressing his regret that the gentleman from Massachusetts had not had time to examine the bill, answered the objections which had been made to it, and explained its various provisions. With regard to the copper coinage, he said the reduction proposed was only from 168 grains, the present weight of the cent, to 140—an immaterial alteration, scarcely at all proportioned to the growing price of copper, which occasioned the reduction. The gentleman, however, when he spoke of the weight of 208 grains, was right as to the original weight of the cent; but, as it had, since first established, been reduced in weight from 208 grains to 168 grains, it was now proposed to reduce it from 168 grains to 140, to keep pace with the price of copper. This reduction, Mr. I. said, was not much, unless cents were made a legal tender, which it had always been his intention to oppose. As, by the constitution of the United States, the States cannot make any thing but gold and silver a legal tender, he thought it better that the Government of the United States should not do, in this respect, what the States are forbidden to do. With regard to the dollar, no reduction in value was proposed. The size of the dollar was now complained of. The slight change proposed in its composition by this bill would render the bulk and weight somewhat less, whilst the quantity of silver remained the same. As to the gold coin, no change was proposed. As to the general character and tendency of the bill, Mr. I. also made some remarks. The mint, he said, had remained under the same regulations, with little variation, from the year 1791 to this time. The length of time which had intervened rendered a revision of the system necessary. The great object of the present bill was to produce a complete organization, a system of arrangement, a plan of business, which should be perfect, so as to enable all who have business with the mint to have a distinct and clear understanding of what is to be done on the part of the public, and of the individuals themselves who are employed by the public to superintend and conduct its operations. This would not have been so necessary, as a system has in fact grown up from usage, but from the establishment of branches, in connexion with the progress of gold-mining in our own country, &c. Mr. I. expatiated at large, and much more particularly than we have stated, on the advantages and benefits which would be secured or promoted by various provisions of the bill.

On motion of Mr. INGERSOLL, the bill was then amended by striking out so much as makes cents and parts of cents a legal tender.

Mr. ADAMS then moved to strike out the whole of the section which goes to fix the weight of the cent and parts of a cent, so as to leave the copper coin where it is. In reply to the suggestion of Mr. INGERSOLL, that the reduction of the weight of the cent from 168 grains to 140 was a small affair, Mr. A. remarked that that gentleman would not probably consider it a very small affair if, on a larger scale, a debtor owing him 168 dollars, or hundreds of dollars, were to offer to pay him with 140. The effect of such a reduction of the value of the coin would be to drive it from circulation into the hands of speculators, whilst the mint might not in many years be able to supply its place with a sufficient number of cents of the new coinage. As to the argument in favor of a new coinage, founded on the increasing price of copper, Mr. A. said he did not know what the price of it now was, but it was low enough to allow of cents being made of the same weight as at present, and still leave a profit to the Government. All profit thus made was a tax upon the people; and reducing the weight would, in the case of the copper coin, be only taking so much more from the people. Reduction of the weight of coin, he also argued, facilitates the obliteration and wearing down of it, and was therefore inexpedient.

Mr. McKIM gave the committee some information in relation to the price of copper, which he said had risen, within six or eight months, as much as 25 per cent.—from 17 cents to 21 or 22 cents per pound—so that, to prevent cents from being melted up, the weight of them ought to be reduced. As much copper was received from the mines as ever, but the increased consumption of the article had advanced the price.

Mr. INGERSOLL suggested that striking out the section would (as all former laws were repealed) leave the country without copper coin, which, he presumed, was not the intention of the gentleman who moved to strike it out. If the object was to leave the copper coin unchanged, it would be readily attained by striking out 140 in the present bill, and inserting 168 grains as the weight for the cent, &c.

Mr. HARPER said that, at the weight of 168 grains, a pound of copper would yield within a fraction of 47 cents; and that was a sufficient gain, even at the present price of copper, as stated by the gentleman from Maryland. Mr. H. therefore moved to strike out 140 and insert 168 grains as the weight of the cent.

Mr. McKIM said that it was of raw copper he spoke, when he stated the current price at 21 or 22 cents. The price of manufactured copper was 31 or 32 cents. Something like 10 per cent. was lost in the refining of it.

Mr. GILLET, after suggesting that the people, and not the Government, would be gainers by a reduction of the weight of the coin, because the old coin, of which the value would certainly be increased by the reduction, is in their hands, said that this was a subject to which he had given much attention, having examined and compared the laws, &c. From the statute book it was impossible, he said, for any man to understand that the cent is to consist of 168 grains of copper. He had himself, like the gentleman from Massachusetts, supposed that the legal weight of the cent was 208 grains; for so says the statute. But he understood that in some law, which he had not met with in the course of his examination, the Executive was authorized to fix the weight of the copper coin by proclamation, and that it had been so fixed at 168 grains. But the statute book does not show it, and he had not been able to find the proclamation. It was, therefore, a matter of high necessity to pass a law which should embrace all existing provisions respecting the weight and value of coins, &c.

The committee then divided on Mr. HARPER's motion; and it was discovered that there was not a quorum present.

So the committee rose, and the House then adjourned.

FRIDAY, DECEMBER 23.

After the reading of the journal of the preceding day, Mr. ASHLEY rose and asked leave to make a few remarks on the subject of certain resolutions from the Legislature of Illinois, in relation to the location of the national road, which had (the day before, when, from indisposition, he was unable to attend the House) been referred to the Committee on Roads and Canals. Hearing some dissenting voices, Mr. A. said he would defer his remarks until a more fit occasion, when the subject should again receive the action of the House. He would then be prepared to show the absurdity of the statements contained in the resolutions, and the remarks which had been made in their support.

INDIAN TREATIES.

The business next in order was the motion, heretofore submitted by Mr. BELL, to reconsider the vote by which the following resolution, offered on a former day by Mr. JONES, Delegate from Wisconsin, had been laid on the table:

Resolved, That the Committee on Indian Affairs be instructed to inquire into the expediency of appropriating money for holding treaties with, and the purchase of the lands belonging to, the Sac, Fox, Sioux, and Winnebago Indians, in Wisconsin Territory, and to provide for their removal west of the Mississippi river.

Mr. BELL briefly explained that, since the vote on this resolution had been taken, he had become satisfied that it might be expedient, if possible, to effect a treaty with one or more, and possibly with all, the tribes referred to in the resolution; and, as the resolution was merely one of inquiry by that committee into the expediency of the measure, he hoped the House would reconsider the vote, and adopt the resolution.

And the question on the motion to reconsider was then taken, and decided in the affirmative. So the vote was reconsidered.

Mr. GARLAND, of Louisiana, called for the reading of the resolution; which having been read,

Mr. G. expressed his belief that the policy pursued by the Government in removing the Indians on to our frontiers had been pursued sufficiently long, and that it was time it should be arrested. He thought that the nation had already acquired too many titles to lands by extinguishing the Indian titles, and locating the Indians in one spot on our Southwestern borders. If that policy was to be continued, he objected to it. He hoped that the House would express its opinion to that effect, by refusing to adopt this resolution.

Mr. BELL trusted the gentleman from Louisiana would, upon reflection, find that this was not the proper time to make his objections to the policy pursued by our Government. He submitted that any opposition to the inquiry into the expediency of removing these Indians must fail, because he thought that sound policy and expediency, not to say necessity, demanded the removal of some of the tribes referred to in the resolution. As to what particular point they should be removed to, that would be matter of subsequent inquiry; and if the Committee on Indian Affairs should report any thing which the gentleman from Louisiana should suppose to be inconsistent with the true policy of the country, he might oppose it hereafter.

Mr. GARLAND, of Louisiana, said it was impossible for him to conjecture what would be the course of the Committee on Indian Affairs on this resolution; but, from the very constitution of that committee, he had reason to believe that the former policy of the Government in relation to the location of the Indian tribes west of the Mississippi was not about to be changed; and if he was correct in that inference, he was not disposed, before he entered his protest against it, to have a report of the committee in favor of this resolution. He well knew the effect of reports of committees in this House, coming in opposition to his own views, and every one knew how very difficult it was to resist the report of a committee favorable to any particular measure. For this reason it was that, if it should be the sense of the House that this policy should no longer be continued, he hoped they would meet the subject now on the threshold; that they would not permit any further extinguishment of Indian titles, nor any further inquiry into the subject, until there should be a greater necessity for it than there was at the present time.

Mr. ASHLEY said that, as a member of the Committee on Indian Affairs, and as representing a portion of the country deeply interested, the subject was one to which he had given much consideration. At one time he had deprecated the policy of locating the Indian tribes on our borders; but as many of them were already there, and as it was evidently the intention of the Government to locate them west of the Mississippi, he thought that the people of the West would feel greater safety, and the Indians themselves greater security, in their being located there, than in their being distributed about the whole country, from the northern to the southern extremity of the United States.

When the Indians were all gathered together on one spot, they became as one family; whereas, generally, when they lived some distance apart, they committed depredations and ravages upon each other, which would not have been committed if living together. Besides, by placing them together, the Government of the United States could more easily take care of them; the laws would be more easily carried into effect, and there would not be so great a number of troops required for protection, as if the Indians were scattered over the country. And if our people had at any time to contend against them, it would be more easy to concentrate their forces at one point, than to spread them over different sections of the country, and less expense would be incurred in the operation. He hoped that the subject might again go to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and be disposed of according as the investigation which they gave to it might justify.

Mr. GARLAND, of Virginia, expressed his opinion, as one of the members of the Committee on Indian Affairs, that the whole question of Indian policy ought not to be opened on a mere question of referring the resolution. That policy had been followed for twenty years, and yet the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. GARLAND] asked the House to abandon it without even a report from a committee. That gentleman had seemed to suppose that the Committee on Indian Affairs had determined, first, to report favorably to the removal of the tribes mentioned in the resolution, and then for their removal on to the borders of the particular State from whence he came.

Mr. G. adverted to the fact that all the troubles which had existed with the Indian tribes had existed and had arisen among those who were scattered over various sections of the country, and not among the tribes congregated on the Western frontier. He hoped the House would suffer the inquiry to be made, and not suffer the policy which had existed twenty years, without proper investigation, to be abandoned.

Mr. HARRISON, of Missouri, was understood to suggest that there was no necessity for the adoption of the resolution, if the information contained in a letter in a newspaper, and this day received by him, was true, namely, that the treaty with the Sacs and Foxes had been concluded.

Mr. GARLAND, of Louisiana, explained, that he did not wish to throw any obstacle in the way of treaties already held. His object simply was to protest against holding any more treaties with Indian tribes.

Mr. GARLAND, of Virginia, repeated his opinion, before expressed, that it was safer, both for the white population and the Indians also, that the latter should be concentrated together, than sparsely scattered about over a large extent of country. He deemed the remarks of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. ASHLEY] of great weight.

Mr. DAVIS expressed his decided opinion that the subject should be referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs. They had in Indiana a very unfortunate example of the results arising from having these tribes within the borders of the white people. The Miami tribe of Indians occupied 34 miles square of the State of Indiana, and exercised all the control and authority of a sovereign nation. Surrounded by the whites, the Indians had followed our vices, without, at the same time, imitating our virtues.

But there was another point. The Indians knew well when their lands became valuable. It was, therefore, not only for their own interest that they should be removed beyond the Mississippi, but it was a matter of pecuniary interest to the United States. The Miami lands were now worth ten dollars per acre, and an ineffectual attempt had been made to purchase them. Emigration was flowing in thither, and the lands were becoming more valuable every year. There was great danger in permitting an Indian sovereignty to exist in the heart of a white settlement. He hoped provision would be made for removing the Indian tribes west of the Mississippi; and he concurred in the opinion that it would be much easier to protect the Indians, and our own frontier too, when they were concentrated and confined within a definite line, even of some two or three hundred miles in extent, than when they were, as now, scattered over thousands of miles.

As a matter of policy, expediency, and pecuniary interest to the United States, and, indeed, from every other consideration, he hoped the Government would provide for their removal.

Mr. PARKER inquired if gentlemen believed that legislation was necessary, because of the tardiness of the President to execute the laws enacted for making treaties with the Indian tribes? If legislation was necessary to spur the President on in this matter, he was very much mistaken in his character.

Mr. DAVIS explained, that the President did not want legislation to spur him on, but he wanted the means of removing those Indians; an appropriation was necessary before the President could do any thing.

Mr. PARKER observed there was money appropriated for holding treaties with those Indians; and it looked to him like an instruction to the President to be forcing this measure. Besides this, the Indians had set a price on their lands; and if this resolution was passed, it would lead them to believe that the Government was anxious to get their lands; consequently, they would raise the price. He hoped the subject would be left as it was.

The resolution was then agreed to: Ayes 99, nocs not counted.

THE TARIFF.

The House proceeded to the consideration of the resolution heretofore offered by Mr. FRY, instructing the Committee on Agriculture to inquire into the expediency of immediately abolishing the duties on foreign grain and bread stuffs of all kinds.

There were two amendments pending: 1st, that of Mr. ADAMS, to include "the duties on foreign coal, salt, and iron." And, 2dly, that of Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, to include the duty on "sugar."

Mr. FRY addressed the House as follows:

Mr. Speaker: When I had the honor, a few days ago, to submit a resolution to inquire into the expediency of immediately abolishing the duty upon foreign bread stuffs, I did it under no other apprehensions than that the wants of the community, arising out of the present scarcity of bread stuffs, earnestly called for a measure of the kind. Such were my convictions of the propriety of the inquiry, that at the time I was not very anxious as to what committee the subject should be referred; yet it did seem to me, upon reflection, that giving the subject into the hands of the Committee on Agriculture was like giving a cause for trial into the hands of one of the parties interested in its decision.

H. of R.]

The Tariff.

As adopting a principle, I should say that when the wants of the community (which in some places at this time amount very nearly to distress) become the subject of legislation, all questions of interest, of policy, or of compromise, should be made to fall before it. The interests of the country, or the policy of the country, in relation to matters and things in general, are, in the ordinary course of things, the proper subjects for legislative action. But when cases of actual want and suffering among a portion of the country present themselves, I feel it my duty, as one of the representatives of the people, to consider those wants, and, if possible, to supply them, even at the risk of interest or policy. I did thus far not anticipate the opposition to the reference of the resolution which it met; but, as the House has seen proper to give a preference to the Committee on Agriculture, because, in the opinion of gentlemen, the resolution was calculated materially to affect the agricultural interest, I hope the House, with equal candor, will reject the amendments proposed, and let this subject go to its appropriate committee free and apart, and unencumbered with any other matters not strictly within the province of the duties of that committee.

Sir, when a member offers a proposition, the result of deep-felt conviction that the wants of the country, or a very large portion of the country, call for it; or when a member in his place offers a resolution instructing the Committee of Ways and Means to inquire into the expediency of abolishing the duty on bread stuffs, and it is pleaded that the Committee on Agriculture is the only proper tribunal for the investigation of that subject, and the House show a disposition to concur in that opinion, and gentlemen afterwards propose amendments, by taking into the account subjects entirely unconnected with the duties of that committee, what does it intimate? what are we to infer? To me it appears as intended to defeat the proposition, and prevent its being referred at all.

I am, therefore, opposed to the amendment, because I believe it intended ultimately to smother and defeat the inquiry, and any action from being had upon the subject; and, sir, is not the subject one that calls for the action of the House? Does not every gentleman upon this floor know well that there is a state of want, if not general, at many places, which must soon amount to actual suffering? Has not the price of bread stuffs doubled itself within no long period, while the price of labor, or the means of the consumer to obtain his bread, have advanced in nothing like the same ratio? I know this to be the case in some large districts of a populous and industrious part of the country. I know the prices of grain are enormously high, in some instances because the farmer has none to sell, and in some instances because they are keeping it for a still higher price; whilst the honest but poor laborer and mechanic, with their families, who have it not, and whose means for obtaining it have not increased in a ratio any way proportioned to the increase in the price of bread stuffs, are left to suffer the consequences. If this were the case in but a single district, ought we not to inquire speedily, if there be no relief, or some mitigation for those who unfortunately become the victims of such a state of things? There is in that part of the country which I represent—and it is a part of the country which, for industry and economy, is not exceeded by any in this Union—there is almost a general want, an absolute scarcity of bread stuffs, which bears exceedingly hard upon the poorer classes of our people. Farmers who, heretofore, have annually sold considerable quantities of grain, have this year, in consequence of the great and almost entire failure of the crops, scarcely sufficient for their own use; yet, perhaps, in a majority of cases, they have sufficient for their own immediate consumption. But, then, a very large, interesting, and useful portion of our people, our laborers and mechanics, upon whose and from whose labor all the real wealth of the country is derived, and upon whom and to whom we have to look as the defenders of the country in time of peril or invasion—this class of our population are without this necessary of life; and, from the circumstance that the prices of labor are not proportioned to that of bread stuffs, they are not only without it, but without the means of obtaining it.

No man in this House, or no man in this country, without actual experience, knows what it is to be poor. There are people who, by extravagance and prodigality in their habits of life, even with a liberal income, are poor; I do not mean them. I mean those who have large families to maintain, frequently overtaken by sickness, either from the want of the necessaries of life, or other causes; who have high rents to pay, high prices for fuel, food, and clothing, and for the support of which the poor man is entirely dependent upon his labor. Such are poor people; and I say, I repeat, no man in this House or in this country, who has been raised and brought up in easy or affluent circumstances, can form the remotest idea of the actual condition and frequent (though often silent) suffering of this valuable portion of our community. Valuable, I say, because it is their labor which produces and constitutes the wealth of the country. It is their labor which sustains and supports your Government, your tariff systems, your banks, and your thousand other corporate and chartered privileged orders, that monopolize, feed and fatten upon the sweat and toil of this great artery in the body politic.

Sir, I have passed the abyss. But I do know, from sad and impressive experience, what it is to be poor; and I can sympathize and feel, and I do feel, for the sufferings and privations of those who are thus situated; and I would sacrifice almost any interest, any policy, and any compromise, to administer as far as in my power to the wants of that unfortunate class of my countrymen.

And what excuse, what justification, can a member of this House plead, in refusing to contribute his mite to alleviate the condition of these people as much as in his power? Why endeavor to defeat the inquiry? What can be the object of enlarging the duties of the Committee on Agriculture, by giving them jurisdiction over the whole tariff system, as proposed by the amendments? None other than to smother the inquiry. Rather may the people of the country, upon whom the present high price of bread stuffs bears insufferably hard, be left in their present situation, deplorable as it is, than we will consent to take down the present duties; for fear, if once commenced, the inquiry might extend itself into the whole system of indirect taxation that now is, and has been since its commencement, grinding the honest, industrious laborer and mechanic down to a level with the slave, upon the mere pretence of collecting money for the support of the Government, when the Government does not need it.

The Secretary of the Treasury, in his late report to this House, by a calculation and estimate upon the future revenue of the country, the force of which, I confess, has not struck me with the utmost severity, predicts that, ere long, the revenue will not be sufficient for the expenses of the Government; and this may be one reason why members are opposed to any modification of the present tariff. But if the inquiry is proposed to extend no further than bread stuffs, as contemplated by this resolution, which have never yet produced any revenue, and which is the most essential necessary of life, the system cannot be affected, nor the revenue impaired, while the wants of the country may be greatly relieved. Again, sir, when such a state of things arrives as that the revenue of the country will not support the Government, it will be good time to inquire whether the expenses of the Government conform to an amount necessary to the permanency and well-being of a plain republican Government. Sir, according to any calculation that I have ever made upon the subject, I think the expenses of the Government (not on account of their amount, but on account of preserving that ancient republican simplicity which has hitherto characterized it) are far, very far, beyond what they ought to be, and perhaps double what they would be, if the people supported the Government by direct taxation. I do not wish to be understood as favoring a plan of direct taxation. I use the words merely to show or rather to convey the idea or opinion of the difference which a different mode of collecting revenue might make to the tax-payer.

The Tariff.

But, sir, if there be more expenses incurred than should be, is there no remedy? Certainly. But where? It is beyond the reach or control of executive vigilance, and cannot be chargeable to the executive account. But, sir, the remedy is here, in this House, and here only. Here it is that offices are created. Here it is that salaries are created, and allowed, and extended, from time to time, until they become exorbitant; just as if we had to legislate exclusively for the benefit of the officers of the Government, without any regard to the situation or condition of those whom we more immediately represent; here it is that all moneys are appropriated; and here it is, in this House alone, that a remedy is to be found; and if the people will avail themselves of it, it is in their power. The people, in selecting their representatives in their national and State councils, should send more farmers, and fewer professional men; more mechanics, and fewer overgrown capitalists. I make the suggestion with perfect deference to the feelings of every gentleman present. But gentlemen will agree with me, that the different classes of the community are never represented according to their respective federal numbers, and which, in a Government where we know of no distinctions, they are entitled to be.

But many people entertain an idea that unless a man can make a speech, he is not qualified for a seat in their councils. Let me say to them that I have not a doubt upon my mind that many of as good and industrious men, and no doubt as able as any in this House, do not pretend to make speeches; they will not waste time. A wholesome discussion is not to be condemned, but I would draw a material distinction between discussion and making speeches. But enough of this.

When I offered the resolution under consideration, gentlemen very earnestly, and, I doubt not, very honestly, asked me, why, are you not a farmer, and do not you represent an agricultural district and interest? Certainly I am; and if I represent any interest at all, it is the agricultural interest. But will any gentleman demonstrate to me that the farmer has any interest at stake in the existing tariff of duties upon foreign imports? Why, gentlemen tell me there is a duty of about twenty-five cents on a bushel of wheat! Well, suppose there is; the foreign wheat, upon an average, is not worth by twenty-five cents as much as our own. I show this, in a measure, from a paper handed me by a gentleman. This shows that, during the three quarters of the present year, the amount imported at New York was 164,000 bushels, valued at $137,000, making about eighty-four cents a bushel. Could our wheat have been purchased at the same price during the same period? No. Again: the importation of wheat, or of any grain, is a mere nominal thing; unless a time, like the present, of great scarcity, there is none imported; and to show that, I will mention that, for the year 1835, the importation at

New York (and which constitutes the great part of the importation) was 2,718 bushels, producing an item of $659 in the revenue derived from imposts, amounting in the whole to about twenty millions. Then, sir, how is the object of the resolution to affect the farming interest? The tariff system is of no earthly advantage to the farmer, because foreign grain cannot, by the existing tariff, be brought into competition with his; and if we only import at times of extreme scarcity, when farmers have little or none to sell, it constitutes an unnecessary tax upon the consumer, without any adequate benefit to the farming interest. Sir, the farming interest is not protected; the small duty upon his wheat was, in the beginning, a mere cheat, to gull him into the support of the whole system—a perfect humbug, so far as the interests of the farmer can compare to the other protected interests; and if you had as many practical farmers here as you ought to have, they would tell you so. But, in another view, if the existing duty upon foreign wheat were an advantage to the farmer, I should still press this inquiry. The farmer at this time, who has the article of bread stuffs to sell, realizes at least double the usual or ordinary prices for his goods. Could he not better take twenty-five cents less than double price for his grain, than the poor consumer can pay such high prices as at present? Surely he could, and would still get an extraordinary price for his grain, while the consumer would be very much relieved.

Sir, gentlemen say I go against the farming interest. This word interest seems to be the germe from which sprang, in a measure, this whole system of protection. Sir, to elucidate my opinion, I fancy to myself that a number of gentlemen meet here; the one wishes to embark in the manufacturing of cottons, another of woollens, another of iron, another has a bed of stone coal, &c.; and they enter into an agreement that, for their mutual benefit, and to make those interests permanent and valuable, they must be protected from competition. As among the parties concerned there may be nothing wrong, for the advance paid by the one upon the interest of the other is repaid by his having the same bounty accruing upon his interest. But these gentlemen constitute but a very small portion of the community; and the great mass of the people, the laborers and mechanics, have no interests to protect; and, consequently, all the profits arising out of those different protected interests are paid by the mass of the community. The whole system is upheld and supported by those industrious poor who have no interest to protect. But some will say, if the wealthy portion of the community prosper, the poor man will prosper too. The argument will not hold good; look around at your manufacturer of cottons or woollens, your manufacturer of iron, your coal merchants, and, in nineteen out of twenty cases, you will find they have realized fortunes, while the poor operatives have, nineteen in twenty cases, not increased a dollar; yet these fortunes are the result of their labors. Other gentlemen say a repeal of the duty could not avail the community any thing, because, before an act could be brought into operation, another and a more fruitful harvest may supply the present scarcity.

Sir, I am informed, and I rely upon the information, that large quantities of bread stuffs are hoarded up, and stored away in the storerooms of heartless and soulless speculators in some of the large cities, who are holding back to the last extremity, in order that they may extort from the poor and the needy to the utmost farthing. Sir, repeal the duty upon foreign bread stuffs, and you will compel them to sell.

That such a state of things exists, especially among the poorer classes of people, as I have mentioned, there can be no doubt; and that the repeal of the duty upon their bread stuffs would relieve them, to some extent, I have no doubt. I think I may safely calculate that if the present duty was taken down, the reduction in the barrel of flour would be one dollar and fifty cents, which would be material to consumers. The President has very properly and very feelingly referred to the subject in his message, and I feel very anxious that the House should act upon the matter.

With regard to the subject of a repeal or modification of the duty upon coal, another necessary of life, second only to bread stuffs, upon the preliminary vote taken a few days ago, referring the subject to a committee, I differed with my colleagues, (I believe with a single exception,) for whose opinions and experience in matters of legislation I entertain the highest respect, because I believed the Committee on Manufactures were in a measure pledged to report against any modification. Now, I will only add at this time, if the Committee of Ways and Means report a bill making such a reduction as will in some measure relieve the situation of the consumers, without embarrassing the mining business, as compared with the manufacturing and other interests, I will vote for it; otherwise, not.

I wish, upon the whole, to legislate for the common benefit and general welfare of the community at large, and not exclusively for individual interests. Gentlemen may compromise themselves rights and advantages over the mass of the community which they have no right to do. I hold the people of this country equally free, and all equally entitled to the benefits of our legislation. I heard a gentleman, who is engaged in the mining business, a few days ago, say that he had sent an agent to Europe to obtain one thousand workmen, and send them here; and that he should soon despatch another agent, authorized to employ another thousand men. These gentlemen, miners and others, parties to the benefits of the tariff system, are opposed to any reduction of the duties upon their respective interests, while they are importing the refuse, perhaps, of European laborers, by the one thousand men, to the great detriment of the laboring classes here, free of duty. Sir, I am prepared to revise the system, to bring the revenue down as far as practicable. Such a course I think necessary, as well to avoid accruing surpluses in the Treasury as to make the benefits of legislation equal to all.

These names of "home and industry," and "Pennsylvania interests," are too often but "tinkling cymbals." I feel as much a Pennsylvanian as any other man; but I cannot consent to make the interests of Pennsylvania capitalists alone the interests of the State. Sir, the people of Pennsylvania were, at the last session of the Legislature, saddled with a "United States Bank," (against the existence of which they had repeatedly decided,) under the garb of Pennsylvania interests; but whatever can or may be done to advance the general interest and welfare, as well of Pennsylvania as any other State, shall, so long as I have a seat here, be my constant aim. I am done. I hope the House will let the inquiry go to the committee, free of amendment, and let them report. If they deem best, let it be but temporary; let the duty be taken off for a limited time; any thing that will in some measure relieve the present exigency; and if they think differently, and can satisfy the country that the duty upon bread stuffs ought not to be repealed, I shall be satisfied, conscious that I have done my duty.

As soon as Mr. FAY had concluded,

Mr. WHITTLESEY called for the orders of the day.

Mr. OWENS made an ineffectual attempt to submit a resolution.

Mr. MANN, of New York, moved a suspension of the rules for the purpose of submitting a motion that when the House adjourn to-day, it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

Mr. WHITTLESEY, of Ohio, asked for the yeas and nays; but the House refused to order them, and the rules were suspended by a vote of 117 to 45.

Mr. MANN then made his motion, and

Mr. ANTHONY moved to amend it, by inserting "Tuesday;" but it was rejected by a vote of 20 to 122. The motion of Mr. MANN was agreed to: Ayes 96, noes 95.

After some further proceedings on private bills, The House adjourned.

MONDAY, DECEMBER 26.

A new member, viz: WILLIAM C. DAWSON, elected from Georgia, to fill the vacancy occasioned by the decease of General COFFEY, appeared, was qualified, and took his seat.

ABOLITION OF SLAVERY.

Mr. ADAMS presented the petition of I. Page and twenty-six other citizens of Silver Lake, Susquehanna county, State of Pennsylvania, praying for the abolition of slavery and the slave trade in the District of Columbia.

Mr. A. moved that the said petition be referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia.

Mr. PICKENS asked for the decision of the Chair upon the construction of the resolution reported from the select committee appointed on the subject of slavery in the District of Columbia, at the last session of Congress. By that resolution, all memorials and other papers relating to this subject had been ordered to lie on the table, without being referred or printed. Mr. P. wished to know what would be the destiny of these petitions under that resolution.

The SPEAKER said it would be a matter for the consideration of the House. After referring to such authorities as he could find, he had come to the decision that the operation of the resolution referred to ceased with the last session of Congress. The question, however, was one for the House to determine.

Mr. PICKENS said he could not consent that these petitions should be referred to any standing committee of the House. He objected, therefore, to the proposed reference of the memorial presented by the gentleman from Massachusetts, and he called for the yeas and nays on that motion.

Mr. PARKS moved to lay the petition on the table.

Mr. CUSHMAN called for the yeas and nays on the last motion; which were ordered.

[The name of Mr. W. THOMPSON, of South Carolina, having been called, Mr. T. rose and inquired whether the act of recording his vote on this motion would imply that he assented to the reception of these petitions at all?

The SPEAKER said that the question of reception could not be now entertained, the petition actually being at the present time in the possession of the House.

Mr. T. thereupon asked to be excused from voting, and the House accordingly excused him.]

And the vote, having been taken, stood: Yeas 116, nays 36, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Chilton Allan, Anthony, Ash, Bean, Beaumont, Bell, Black, Boon, Boyd, Brown, Bunch, Cambreleng, Carr, Carter, Casey, G. Chambers, J. So the motion was laid on the table.

After the roll had been called through, Mr. GARLAND, of Virginia, asked leave to vote. Objection being made, Mr. G. stated that if he had been in the hall at the time, he would have voted against receiving the petition in any shape or form.

Mr. DAVIS asked the consent of the House, at this time, to take up and consider a resolution heretofore offered by him, providing that all resolutions, petitions, memorials, and other papers, which might be offered during the present session of Congress, in any manner relating to the abolition of slavery and the slave trade in the District of Columbia, or in any of the Territories of the United States, should, on presentation, be laid upon the table, without being read or ordered to be printed, and without debate.

Objection having been made, Mr. D. moved a suspension of the rule.

Mr. OWENS called for the yeas and nays on that motion.

A count having been taken on the motion of Mr. OWENS, there appeared no quorum voting.

Mr. ADAMS asked whether the question was debatable?

The SPEAKER said it was not.

Mr. ADAMS said he would submit to the mover of the motion to suspend the rule, whether he had not better postpone the consideration of this question until some future day, instead of discussing it to-day, which was petition day. He (Mr. A.) was willing that the gentleman's proposition should be fully and thoroughly discussed, and he hoped it would be so. But he did not think this was the proper time for the discussion.

Mr. ANTHONY said that, as gentlemen had been so anxious to come here to-day, and as there was no quorum present, he wished to know who was away; for this reason, he moved a call of the House; which motion prevailed: Ayes 77, noes 65.

So the House ordered the call.

The roll having been thereupon called, 170 members answered to their names; when,

On motion of Mr. E. WHITTLESEY, further proceedings in the call were suspended.

And the question on the motion to suspend the rule was then taken, and decided in the negative. So the House refused to suspend the rule.

THE TARIFF.

The unfinished business of the morning hour was the resolution heretofore offered by Mr. FRX, instructing the Committee on Agriculture to inquire into the expediency of immediately abolishing the duties on foreign grain, or on bread stuffs of all kinds.

To which resolution two amendments had been heretofore offered:

First, by Mr. ADAMS, to amend by inserting the words "and also on foreign coal, salt, and iron."

And, secondly, by Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, by inserting the words "and sugar."

Mr. ANTHONY said he should not have deemed it his duty at the present time to make any remarks in reference to the resolution before the House, had it not originated with his honorable colleague, [Mr. FRX;] but as it came from the State which he had the honor in part to represent, he could not refrain from the expression of his surprise at the source from whence the resolution emanated. His colleague represented an agricultural district, and had said that the present high prices of grain and flour operated heavily on the poor; and, as there was a scarcity in the country, foreign importations should be made free of duty. In examining a question of such vital importance to the agricultural and manufacturing interests of the country, Mr. A. contended that we should look at the tariff as a whole, and not attempt to legislate by piecemeal. His colleague had doubtless not foreseen that his attempt would be followed by those of the gentlemen from Massachusetts and North Carolina; but the numerous petitions from Boston and New York, for an abolition of the duty on coal, would at once suggest the amendment including that article. At first glance it might appear that the increased price of an article was a serious injury to the consumer, and that competition in such case should be left open to the world; but was it not known to the whole House that the present high price of bread stuffs was caused by a deficiency of the crops in the grain-growing States? That the evil was merely temporary? And he submitted whether it was sound policy to violate the compromise bill, because the farmers had not been so fortunate the past year as heretofore. They were already seriously affected by the loss, and his colleague would now prevent them from receiving little more than the usual price for the scanty produce of their farms, by permitting the importation of foreign grain free of duty. Such a course would make the burden fall with peculiar hardship on the agricultural community; whereas, if the price were increased on account of the scarcity, every portion of the people would assist to bear the burden; thus lessening the temporary evil by a participation therein of the mechanic and manufacturer as well as the farmer.

It is, however, urged that the high price of fuel and bread stuffs materially affects the poor laboring class. To this proposition I (said Mr. A.) cannot assent; for although the necessities of life cost more, yet it matters not to the workman whether he pays $1 or $2 for a bushel of wheat, if his wages are in proportion to the price. When trade is brisk, and laborers are in demand, notwithstanding provisions are high, the poor are much better provided for than when business is dull and industry paralyzed. Let me for a moment call the attention of the House to the coal and iron region of Pennsylvania, where we may see thousands and tens of thousands of the poor hard-working class daily engaged in mining operations, in the manufacture of iron, and in transporting their coal and iron to market. The busy hum of industry is heard throughout the whole extent of those mineral regions, and high wages are given to every working man. How much better is it for those men to pay $10 a barrel for flour, than to get it for $5 when they have no means of livelihood, and are thrown out of employ! While their services are in demand, their wages increase with the increase of the price of the article they supply; and when they can no longer be profitably employed, they must inevitably lose, however depreciated all the necessities and comforts of life may be.

The present price of coal is, in a great measure, owing to the fact that the demand has, within the past year, increased more rapidly than the supply. Although the means of the country are abundantly sufficient to supply all its wants, yet the demand has increased with unexpected rapidity, and dealers in coal were not prepared for it. From the year 1825 to 1833, there was a rapid increase of supply by the mines of Pennsylvania; but, at the end of the last-mentioned year, a large quantity was left on hand; and in 1834, although 100,000 tons less were mined than in 1833, yet coal was sold at from $4 to $5, and the owners could not dispose of all on hand at that reduced price. The consequence was, that a heavy loss was sustained on the article by those engaged in mining operations in that year, and miners were discharged by hundreds, and compelled to seek employment in other quarters. In 1835 and 1836 the demand increased with surprising rapidity, as mineral coal came into use much more extensively than heretofore; and although the supply greatly increased, yet, as a large number of miners had been dismissed for want of employ in 1834, it was not so easy to get them back at a moment's warning. With all these difficulties to encounter, and when the coal business in Pennsylvania is still almost in its infancy, and needs the fostering care and protection of our Government, we have been enabled to almost double the supply since 1834; and in the coming year a much larger quantity will be sent to market, as extensive preparations are in progress, throughout the whole coal region, to afford an abundant supply to the wants of the country. The scarcity of miners has increased their wages; this, added to the high price of provisions, has caused complaints of the present exorbitant price of coal; but it must be evident that these evils are only temporary, and will cease to exist with the causes which produced them. The competition that is now going on in Pennsylvania will insure a future supply of the article to consumers at a just rate, and one at which they will have no reason to complain.

The Turiff.

But my friend from Pennsylvania says, "all the profits arising out of those different protected interests are paid by the mass of the community. The whole system is upheld and supported by those industrious poor who have no interest to protect." Suppose we permit the importation of grain, coal, iron, &c., free of duty, what is to become of those "industrious poor?" Foreign capitalists will immediately glut our market with those articles at reduced prices, so as to prevent our competition. Hundreds of laborers will be without employment, because the iron, mining, and agricultural business will no longer be profitable; our canals and railroads will be unoccupied; our mountains and valleys will remain uncultivated; and where we now behold bustle, activity, and enterprise, we shall shortly see nothing but poverty and solitude. It is worse than folly to suppose that there is any distinct interest between the different classes of our country. The rich have the means to provide employment for the poor. The laborer contributes to the benefit of the capitalist, while he obtains a competent support for himself and family. Take away all inducement from the moneyed man to embark in business, and you most assuredly will take the bread from the mouth of the honest and industrious laborer.

It is, however, objected by my colleague, that a mining gentleman has brought 1,000 laborers from Europe, and intends sending for 1,000 more; thus, as he says, "importing the refuse, perhaps, of European laborers, by the thousand, to the great detriment of the laboring classes here." If the gentleman is sincere in his partiality for those from whose labor, he says, all the real wealth of the country is derived, why is his friendship for that class so contracted? The laborer is worthy of his hire, let him come from where he may. But is it not far better that we should cultivate our own soil, mine our own coal, and manufacture our own iron, than buy them from abroad, where nearly the whole profits go to foreigners, and where foreign laborers are alone employed?

The compromise bill, as it is called, of March, 1833, gradually reduces the revenue till 1842; and, on the faith of that law, a large amount of capital had been expended, immense preparations have been made, and thousands of hands have been employed in Pennsylvania in the coal and iron region; towns and villages have arisen as it were by enchantment; canals and railroads have been constructed at vast expense; mechanics and laborers and manufacturers are receiving the highest wages, and so greatly are they wanted that capitalists are obliged to send abroad for them. Let me not be told that there is distress in the country where such a state of things exists. Our mountains, which, but a few years since, were a barren wild, are now teeming with a hardy, industrious, and thriving population. Every man who is able and willing to work can find profitable employment; and I would extremely regret to see any measures adopted by this House which would destroy the compromise, and, with it, the expectations of those who have embarked largely in business, by virtue of the fostering provisions of that act.

If we look around us, we shall find ample means for disposing of a large amount of the surplus revenue the ensuing year. Your Post Office and your Patent Office are in ruins; a considerable sum will be necessary to erect fire-proof buildings for those departments of the National Government, and the money cannot be more judiciously expended. You also have on hand a Treasury building, which will require a large sum for its completion.

In addition to these national edifices, which should be constructed in the most secure and permanent manner, the representatives of Pennsylvania, on behalf of their constituents, would respectfully though earnestly ask for the erection of a custom-house, in the city of Philadelphia, commensurate with the increase of business in that great and growing commercial city. The present custom-house affords neither convenience nor security; and although we do not desire the construction of a marble palace, equal in splendor and magnificence to that in the city of New York, yet we want a good substantial edifice, that will combine utility with safety. The circuit court of the United States has no place to hold its sessions in Philadelphia, except in buildings belonging to the city; and the post office is in the same situation. Is it not better to appropriate some of the surplus to the erection of convenient buildings for our courts and for the collection of the revenue, and thus give employment to the "industrious poor," than at once to diminish the tariff so materially as to prevent any appropriations for those important and highly beneficial objects?

If, after these expenditures, it is still found that we have more money than we know how to spend, let us adopt the recommendation of the President, who says:

"Much good, in my judgment, would be produced by prohibiting the sales of the public lands except to actual settlers, at a reasonable reduction of price, and to limit the quantity which shall be sold to them. Although it is believed the General Government never ought to receive any thing but the constitutional currency in exchange for the public lands, that point would be of less importance if the lands were sold for immediate settlement and cultivation. Indeed, there is scarcely a mischief arising out of our present land system, including the accumulating surplus of revenue, which would not be remedied at once by a restriction on land sales to actual settlers; and it promises other advantages to the country in general, and to the new States in particular, which cannot fail to receive the most profound consideration of Congress."

By restricting the sales of public lands to actual settlers, we shall prohibit that wild speculation which has been carried on for some time in Western lands, and which must inevitably, if persisted in, do essential injury to the new States. If actual settlers alone are permitted to purchase the public lands, the country will have the advantage of an industrious, enterprising population; but, as it now is, every eligible situation, all the best locations, are selected by speculators; and if a poor man wishes to purchase a home for himself and family, he must buy of those who have been beforehand in obtaining all the choice lands in the vicinity.

The vast amount of twenty-four millions has been received the present year from our public lands; and it is evident that, if we refuse to sell them to any but actual settlers, but a small sum will accrue from that source the next year. If, therefore, the true policy of the Government be to reduce the receipts of the national Treasury to its expenditures, I would certainly prefer the suggestion of the President in relation to our lands, than to disturb the country by an agitation at the present time of the tariff, which was so satisfactorily adjusted by the compromise bill of 1833.

Should it, however, be found absolutely necessary to take up the subject of the tariff, and thoroughly examine it in all its bearings, I will not raise my voice against it. All that I ask, as a Pennsylvanian, is, that the best interests of my native State shall not be the first at which the blow shall be aimed. If grain, iron, and coal, are to be deprived of protection, let us examine whether other protected articles shall not share the same fate. I am, therefore, opposed to the original resolution, as well as the amendments, and hope they may all be rejected.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Louisiana, said that, as the question immediately before the House was on the adoption of the amendment proposing to include the article of "sugar," it was his wish to offer a few observations. But, by way of testing the sense of the House, he would move to lay the whole subject on the table; which motion prevailed.

So the resolution and amendments were laid on the table.

RECEIPTS AND EXPENDITURES.

The House took up for consideration the motion, heretofore made by Mr. PARKER, to print five thousand extra copies of the accounts of receipts and expenditures of the United States for the year 1835.

Mr. ADAMS said he believed this was an unusual motion. He had never opposed the printing of an extra number of a document, if it were important that it should be spread before the people. But this document, in the first place, was of very considerable size; and it was a new thing, he believed, though he was not certain, and, if in error, the gentleman who made the motion [Mr. PARKER] could correct him, to print an extra number of this, which was an annual document. He believed it to be unusual, if not unexampled. Now, although he believed the document to be important, and although it was extremely proper that it should be in the possession of every member of Congress, and that it should be faithfully studied and reflected on by them, yet it did not appear to him to be a document of much use to circulate numerously among the people. The people, in fact, might derive very little information from it. There was in that document a general summary, in the space of one or two pages, containing the amount of receipts and expenditures, which it would be proper to circulate among the people, and which, he believed, was usually done every year. But he could not vote for this motion, unless some reason was given for a proceeding so unusual; although he did not know that he had ever before opposed the printing of an extra number. Generally speaking, he was in favor of going to this expense; he thought it a well-deserved expense. But, in the present instance, the expense would not only be heavy at the present time, but it was unexampled; and, if done now, he took it for granted it would be done every year hereafter. He thought it was a document which was particularly prepared for the use of members of Congress. As such, it was very important; and, as such, it should be supplied in sufficient numbers to give the citizens all necessary information. But it was not a document usually circulated in large numbers among the people, nor one which would be productive of any beneficial effects if it was so circulated. He hoped the gentleman from New Jersey could give some sufficient reason why his motion should be agreed to.

Mr. PARKER, in defence of his motion, replied that it was very important, in his opinion, that the document should be freely circulated among the people, because it showed the disbursements of the public money from time to time. It showed to the people what had become of the money which had been raised by means of imposts, taxes, and the receipts of public lands. It showed in what manner the trust reposed in Congress, for the disposition of the public money, had been executed; it showed what had become of that money, to whom it was applied, and for what purposes. He was willing, if any gentleman proposed it, to submit to a modification of his motion, so far as concerned the number of copies. But he hoped the House would support him in his endeavors to have some extra copies printed.

And the question was taken, and decided in the negative: Ayes 52, noes, 84. So the motion was rejected.

AMOUNT OF DUTIES.

The following resolution, offered by Mr. HUNTSMAN on the same day, was taken up:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be requested to communicate to this House the amount of duties collected upon salt in the years 1834, 1835, and 1836, as far as it can be estimated.

Mr. McKIM moved to add the words "and coal" after the word "salt;" which Mr. HUNTSMAN accepted as a modification.

Mr. McKAY suggested a further modification, so as to embrace a call for the whole amount of duties received upon every article of foreign imports for the last four years. Mr. McK. moved, as a substitute, the following:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury cause to be prepared, for the use of this House, as soon as convenient, a tabular statement, showing the nett amount of revenue receivable from customs for the last four years, distinguishing the amount received in each year.

Mr. CAMBRELENG hoped the gentleman from Tennessee would accept this as a modification, for it was of vast importance at this time to have the inquiry extended.

Mr. HUNTSMAN accepted the substitute as a modification.

Mr. PICKENS inquired of the gentleman from North Carolina if he meant the "gross" or "nett" revenue.

Mr. McKAY replied, the "nett."

Mr. PICKENS remarked that it would be scarcely possible to procure such a return.

Mr. McKAY, by consent of the original mover, modified the resolution by retaining both words, "nett and gross."

Mr. GILLET said he would suggest to the gentleman from Tennessee, to ask only for the gross amount of revenue on such articles, as far as it can be given. As far as the great classes of articles were concerned, it would be easily complied with. The nett revenue upon the aggregate of articles could be, he presumed, soon given. But it would be impossible to furnish, with accuracy, the nett revenue on each article in detail. It would be easy to furnish the amount of revenue at a single port, and the expenses of collection, and the amount of drawback thereon; but he knew of no way in which a correct apportionment of the former could be made upon the various articles imported there. A cargo may consist of a hundred different articles, paying different rates of duties. He would ask how the charges upon the revenue could be apportioned upon each? It might be done so as to approximate to the truth, but nothing more. The drawbacks paid had been stated as charges upon the collection of revenue from the customs, and had led many gentlemen into error, and induced them to believe that the expenses of collection were far greater than they were in fact. The drawback of duties, in fact, forms no part of the expenses of collection.

Geological Reconnoissance—Michigan.

Mr. CAMBRELENG thought the gentleman from South Carolina and his own colleague had misapprehended what was meant by the term "nett" revenue. The nett revenue was the difference between the amount of the gross revenue upon the whole article of imports from abroad and that of the drawbacks upon the same article; and one statement could be furnished by the Secretary of the Treasury as well as the other. It had nothing to do with the expenses of collection.

Mr. GILLET said he thought his colleague was in error on this subject. It seemed to him that the nett revenue was the amount received over and above all expenses of collection. This, he thought, was the ordinary acceptance of the expression. He believed his memory did not mislead him when he stated that this was the understanding of it at the Treasury. He recollected that in a document communicated to this House, relating to the compensation of custom-house officers, it had been so understood. The nett revenue stated in that document was the balance, after deducting the expenses of collection and drawbacks. The latter, he thought, in fact, formed no part of the expenses, though heretofore so stated. He would suggest that the resolution be so altered as to require the gross revenue, and the amount of drawback on each article. This would give what all wanted. All agree in the object of obtaining the information. Unless we put it in this shape, we could not expect to have the resolution answered sufficiently early to be of any service to us this session. By this resolution we shall obtain information in a condensed form, which is now somewhat scattered in the documents annually laid upon our tables.

Mr. REYNOLDS, of Illinois, moved that the House adjourn.

Mr. WHITTLESEY called for the yeas and nays, which were not ordered; and the motion to adjourn was decided in the negative: Yeas 60, nays 63.

The question again recurring on the above resolution, Mr. CAMBRELENG moved to strike out the word "nett," and insert the words "together with the amount of drawbacks upon each article;" which Mr. HUNTSMAN accepted as a modification; and the resolution, as modified, was agreed to.

GEOLOGICAL RECONNOISSANCE.

The following resolution, offered by Mr. HENDERSON on the 20th instant, was then taken up:

Resolved, That 5,000 copies of the Senate document No. 333, entitled "Report of a Geological Reconnoissance made in 1835, from the seat of Government, by the way of Green Bay and the Wisconsin Territory, to the Coteau De Prairie, by G. W. Featherstonhaugh, United States geologist," be printed for the use of the members of this House.

On motion of Mr. H., the resolution was modified by the addition of the following words: "under the direction of Mr. Featherstonhaugh."

Mr. PARKER objected to the resolution, unless some gentleman would give good reasons for its adoption.

Mr. G. JEE said he had voted uniformly for motions to print the public documents; the people were entitled to the knowledge of all the proceedings of the Government; they desire this knowledge, and he had seen no document which was not proper and useful for the people to read and discuss.

The gentleman from New Jersey asks who wants the document—who will read it? and expresses an opinion that not one in one hundred thousand will read it. I will inform the gentleman that several scientific gentlemen have written to me for copies. I have this day applied at the document office for them, and am informed that not a single copy remains. The subject of the geology of our country is an interesting subject to all classes, and especially the geology of our wide-spread, hitherto unexplored regions; and I believe the very reverse of the opinion of the gentleman from New Jersey would be nearer the truth. I believe that not one in one hundred thousand of the reading community would fail to read it if they had the document; and I believe, moreover, that the printing and the distribution by Congress is the most convenient and the cheapest mode of disseminating information that can be devised.

The question on the resolution, as modified, was then taken, and the vote being yeas 71, nays 47—no quorum—

Mr. PARKER moved that the House adjourn: Lost, 64 to 65.

Mr. OWENS moved to lay the resolution on the table: Lost, without a count.

Mr. BELL wished to know if this work had been examined by any one competent to judge of its merits; for they had often ordered books to be printed which turned out to be worthless. He moved that the resolution be referred to the Committee on the Library.

Mr. HENDERSON accepted this as a modification; and, so modified, the resolution was agreed to.

The House then adjourned.

TUESDAY, DECEMBER 27.

MICHIGAN.

The following message, in writing, was received from the President of the United States, by the hands of his private secretary, ANDREW JACKSON, Jr., Esq.

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America:

By the second section of the act, "to establish the northern boundary line of the State of Ohio, and to provide for the admission of the State of Michigan into the Union, upon the conditions therein expressed," approved June 15th, 1836, the constitution and State Government which the people of Michigan had formed for themselves was ratified and confirmed, and the State of Michigan declared to be one of the United States of America, and admitted into the Union upon an equal footing with the original States, but on the express condition that the said State should consist of, and have jurisdiction over, all the territory included within certain boundaries described in the act, and over none other. It was further enacted, by the third section of the same law, that, as a compliance with the fundamental condition of admission, the boundaries of the State of Michigan, as thus described, declared, and established, should "receive the assent of a convention of delegates, elected by the people of said State for the sole purpose of giving the assent therein required; that, as soon as such assent should be given, the President of the United States should announce the same by proclamation; and that, thereupon, and without any further proceeding on the part of Congress, the admission of the State into the Union, as one of the United States of America, should be considered as complete, and her Senators and Representatives in the Congress of the United States entitled to take their seats without further delay.

In the month of November last, I received a communication, enclosing the official proceedings of a convention assembled at Ann Arbor, in Michigan, on the 26th of September, 1836, all which are herewith laid before you. It will be seen, by these papers, that the convention therein referred to was elected by the people of Michigan, pursuant to an act of the State Legislature, passed on the 25th of July last, in consequence of the above-mentioned act of Congress, and that it declined giving its assent to the fundamental condition prescribed by Congress, and rejected the same.

On the 24th instant, the accompanying paper, with its enclosure, containing the proceedings of a convention of delegates subsequently elected, and held in the State of Michigan, was presented to me. By these papers, which are also herewith submitted for your consideration, it appears that elections were held in all the counties of the State except two, on the 5th and 6th days of December, instant, for the purpose of electing a convention of delegates to give the assent required by Congress; that the delegates then elected assembled in convention on the 14th day of December, instant; and that on the following day the assent of the body to the fundamental condition above stated was formally given.

This latter convention was not held or elected by virtue of any act of the Territorial or State Legislature; it originated from the people themselves, and was chosen by them in pursuance of resolutions adopted in primary assemblies, held in the respective counties. The act of Congress, however, does not prescribe by what authority the convention shall be ordered, or the time when or the manner in which it shall be chosen. Had these latter proceedings come to me during the recess of Congress, I should therefore have felt it my duty, on being satisfied that they emanated from a convention of delegates elected in point of fact by the people of the State, for the purpose required, to have issued my proclamation thereon, as provided by law. But as the authority conferred on the President was evidently given to him under the expectation that the assent of the convention might be laid before him during the recess of Congress, and to avoid the delay of a postponement until the meeting of that body, and as the circumstances which now attend the case are in other respects peculiar, and such as could not have been foreseen when the act of June 15, 1836, was passed, I deem it most agreeable to the intent of that law, and proper for other reasons, that the whole subject should be submitted to the decision of Congress. The importance of your early action upon it is too obvious to need remark.

ANDREW JACKSON.

WASHINGTON, December, 1836.

The message, having been read, was, on motion of Mr. CRAIG, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and, with the accompanying documents ordered to be printed.

PROTECTION OF SEAMEN.

Mr. CAMBRELENG offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce be instructed to inquire into the expediency of repealing all laws authorizing protections to be issued to American seamen.

Mr. C. briefly explained the object of this resolution. He said it was matter of surprise that these laws had not been repealed before this time. In the early stages of our Government, in the infancy of our dangers, such laws were necessary. But now the time had arrived when the flag of our country was in itself a sufficient protection. The American seamen were taxed heavily for the payment of these protections, and no necessity, he thought, existed for their continuance.

Mr. PARKER was understood to oppose the object of the resolution, on the ground that there were many cases in which such protections were indispensable; such, for instance, as shipwreck.

Mr. McKEON hoped that the gentleman from New Jersey would yield his objections. It was merely for inquiry, and he trusted that the House would not oppose a proposition which made an inquiry into the propriety of relieving a highly deserving class of our citizens from an onerous tax.

Mr. PARKER said he would not oppose the adoption of the resolution.

Mr. D. J. PEARCE said that he should, at a proper time, object to any alteration in the law referred to. It had been adopted with a view to increase the number of American seamen. The resolution, like many others submitted to this House, looked to an existing evil, and took the present year as a standard for years to come. The law, as it now stood, served to increase the number of our seamen; the resolution, to his mind, looked to a decrease.

Mr. CAMBRELENG could not understand how the removal of an actual existing tax upon seamen was to decrease their number. In his opinion, the tax ought to be abolished. If the Committee on Commerce should see any reason why it should be continued, he would yield his own opinion to that committee. He wished to refer it to them simply as a matter of inquiry. So far as he had himself examined the subject, and from the information he had collected from sources where the subject ought to be best understood, he was decidedly of opinion that the law ought to be abolished.

Mr. GILLET hoped the resolution would pass, but suggested to Mr. CAMBRELENG so to enlarge the resolution as to instruct the committee to inquire into the expediency of abolishing the fees.

Mr. CAMBRELENG accepted the modification.

Mr. ADAMS said he was very glad the proposition had been made; that he hoped the subject would be referred to the Committee on Commerce, and that they would consider it in all its aspects, and present a report on which the House might act with deliberation. It was a great and important change which was proposed to be made in the condition of the seamen of the United States. He had said it was a great and important change; great and important in the present state of things, and which might become much more important from day to day by a change, not in our own condition, but in that of other nations. He had his doubts, therefore, whether this resolution was not too extensive. If, however, a report was made by the Committee on Commerce, they would present their views fully on the subject. He had his doubts whether it was expedient to repeal all the laws for the protection of American seamen. He doubted very much whether, even in a state of peace, American seamen ought not to be furnished with some document or paper, constituting their national character, which should protect them over the surface of the globe. He did not know but that, in the present condition of the world, American seamen might cross over the ocean without any serious danger from wanting such a document; but inasmuch as they had been possessed of such a document for more than forty years, he had some hesitation in abolishing it altogether, lest thereby that very useful and important class of men should lose the protection which was afforded them by that document, when distant from their country.

The world, or at least the United States, had been at peace for upwards of twenty years; and there might be gentlemen in that House who did not know what was the origin of the protection which it was now proposed to take away. It originated in the practice of impressment by the British Government in time of war; the practice of taking out of all vessels every seamen whom the officers of the British armed ships might think proper to consider as a British subject. The United States had endured this national indignity, and our seamen had endured this heavy affliction, for a period of five-and-twenty years, during all the wars of the French revolution; and all these laws had been founded upon the practice of the British Government, by which, from the moment it entered upon or projected a war, the King, by an order of council, authorized his officers on the sea to take British seamen wherever they were to be found, without regard to their condition, without regard to their rights, and without regard to the engagements by which they might be bound. This order of the British council was not legal, even in England, in time of peace; but the King, by his prerogative, had the power of making war; and whenever he projected any thing like hostilities against another nation, from that moment an order of council was issued to take British seamen, wherever they were to be found, from all American vessels. By this order, for twenty-five years, every seaman whom the officer sent to search or examine our vessels chose to consider as a British subject was taken, and the only check or counteracting influence ever enjoyed by the United States was this very same protection which it was now proposed to take away. It was introduced as an expedient for saving native American citizens, or naturalized American citizens, from being taken away in this manner, and impressed on board the British ships of war, to serve the King of England for an indefinite length of time; to expose their lives in his wars, and to be entirely deprived of that protection which their country owed them. Now, he hoped that, if the resolution passed, and was considered by the committee, they would consider it with very serious reference to this state of things; and that, if all the laws of protection were to be repealed, they would provide some substitute by which the American seaman should still be protected. He hoped it was not the intention of the gentleman from New York [Mr. CAMBRELENG] to take from the seaman the actual protection of his country.

[Mr. CAMBRELENG explained that the role d'équipage, which every master of a vessel took from the custom-house, was a sufficient protection to the sailor when on the ocean. He did not see that any American seaman could require a greater protection. The law of the land expressly provided that no seaman should be discharged a board; on that score, therefore, there was no difficulty. It was not his design to take away any protection from seamen; he wished only to relieve them from a grievous tax, if it could be done without impairing any important principle.]

Mr. ADAMS, in continuation, said it had not been his intention when he rose to oppose the resolution, nor did he mean now to oppose it; but he did mean to remind the House that a proposition thus made was a proposition involving a question of peace and war; and it was a question of peace and war with no less a Power than Great Britain; and he hoped that the committee would view the subject with reference to that role d'équipage which the gentleman from New York declared to be a sufficient protection. Did not that gentleman know that there was not an officer in the British service who would look upon it as any more than a piece of waste paper? If the order of council, authorizing this impressment of seamen were issued to-morrow, and it infallibly would be issued in case Great Britain was arrayed against any maritime Power—against France, Russia, Sweden, Denmark, or any other Power—I ask the gentleman what good his role d'équipage would do to protect an American citizen, native or otherwise, against that order? It would be no protection at all. But the British officers would ransack every vessel of the ocean, and would take out every able-bodied man whom they chose to say was a British subject. And what would we do? We would remonstrate; we would instruct our minister in England to remonstrate; and we would cavil and quarrel as we did twenty-five years ago; and, finally, we would come to a war. That was the cause of the war; there never would have been a war but for that cause; it was a war as righteous as was ever waged on the face of the earth; and, much as he abhorred war upon earth, he hoped it would come in less than twenty-five weeks, if a seaman should ever again be taken out of an American vessel. That was the cause of the war.

Twenty-two years had now elapsed, during which, in time of peace, the United States had been constantly endeavoring to settle this matter with Great Britain, and had never been able to do so. The United States had made war, and had been obliged to make peace, without remedying the evil. Would they, then, now take away this protection from an American seaman, not perhaps very necessary, yet it might be very proper in time of peace? This was a proper subject for inquiry by a committee. But he wished especially to caution the House against the abolition of that particular protection, without something were substituted which would secure the seaman on the ocean. As to the fees which the seaman paid for the protection, he (Mr. A.) would vote for their abolition at this time; but, under the color of relieving the sailor from that trifle, he was not willing to take from him that which was a talisman to carry him safe through the world, against the practice of the British Government (and he did not wish to bandy words or to qualify the truth) of seizing seamen upon every occasion to serve the British King; and, under the pretence that he spoke the same language, taking it for granted that every stout able-bodied American seaman was a British subject. He wished to say no more, nor did he wish to oppose the resolution.

Mr. CUSHING said he did not rise for the particular purpose of opposing the adoption of the resolution. Indeed, he thought some inquiry, upon a point closely connected with the present, not undesirable. He referred to the provision of the law requiring the employment in the merchant service of a certain proportion of American, as distinguished from foreign, mariners. Owing to causes not immediate only, as implied in the remarks of the gentleman from Rhode Island, [Mr. PEARCE,] not temporary only, but permanent in their operation, there is a deficiency of seamen for the supply of our mercantile as well as our military marine. Not only does the difficulty exist, but it operates unequally in the different parts of the United States. At some custom-houses, as he (Mr. C.) had had occasion to know in his own business, there is more rigor in the administration of the law in this respect, in others less; which gives a sensible advantage to the commerce of those ports where the most liberality is manifested. It might deserve consideration whether some relaxation of the existing laws in that particular may not be proper and expedient. There certainly could be no serious objection to having the subject examined by a committee.

But (Mr. C. said) he wished to object most distinctly and emphatically to the reasons with which the gentleman from New York [Mr. CAMBRELENG] advocated the passage of the resolution. He entertained views the very opposite of those which that gentleman had expressed.

The gentleman from New York says a protection is not necessary to the seaman, because the role d'équipage will indicate his citizenship. But is not the role a secondary piece of evidence only, made up from the protections themselves? And what foreign officer, then, would receive the role as conclusive proof of the citizenship of any individual whose name happened to be borne upon it? Beside which, the individual needs a document which may accompany his person. But the role d'équi- page belongs to the ship. The individual seaman may be discharged. His contract of service may expire in a foreign port. The ship may be wrecked. And what, then, becomes of his protection? Is it not self-evident that he should have a separate document to prove his citizenship, to accompany himself wherever he navigates the sea?

But Mr. C. has a still graver difference with the gentleman from New York. He [Mr. CAMBRELENG] seems to think there is something discreditable, either to the country or the individual, in the fact of the latter bearing a protection. Is not this a most mistaken view of the subject? I heartily rejoice, (said Mr. CUSHING,) in common with the gentleman from New York, that a series of brilliant naval victories, during the last war, has vindicated the honor of our flag in this matter; and I trust we shall never cease to maintain the same controversy with equal decision and triumph. But is it dishonorable to carry a protection? By no means. How stands the fact? If an American citizen desires to travel to foreign countries, he sends to the Department of State, and, upon proof of his citizenship, obtains a passport; if a seaman desires to pass on the ocean, he repairs to an officer of the customs, and on similar proof obtains a protection. The things differ in name; in substance they are one. Each of them is a certificate, signed by some officer of the Government authorized by law, attesting the citizenship of the individual named and described in the document. Is it any disgrace to the United States to give, or the citizen to receive, such a document? Surely not. The protection is to the mariner at sea what the passport is to the landsman on shore. Am I (said Mr. C.) dishonored by bearing such a document in foreign lands or in distant seas? On the contrary, is it not matter of pride, as well as convenience, that, armed only with a paper bearing the seal of the United States, I may travel the earth over, secure, in every place, of the protection of the ministers of my country, of the good-will of the functionaries of countries allied with us, and, if need be, of the guns and whole public force of the republic to vindicate any injury done to my person? That I may go unharmed throughout the world, under the magic influence of the broad seal of the United States?

One thing, in this connexion, (Mr. C. said,) deserved the interposition of this House. The landsman, though probably better able than the mariner to pay for his passport, obtained it from the Department of State free of cost. The seaman ought to have his free of cost. The fee paid by him to the customs for his protection ought to be immediately abolished, and then the situation of all citizens, in this particular, would be equal. And he should insist, if the resolution was to be adopted, on amending it to this effect.

Mr. CAMBRELENG expressed his astonishment at what had fallen from the honorable gentleman, [Mr. CUSHING.] This was the first time he (Mr. C.) had even heard that protections were given to our seamen with a view to their convenience when on their travels in foreign countries.

He must express his astonishment at the pertinacity with which some members still persisted in holding allegiance to the British flag. The protection referred to had nothing to do with travelling in foreign countries. Every captain of a vessel was bound by the law to pay three months' wages to a seaman if he left him in a foreign port, if in an island where there was no consul of ours residing; yet a captain dare not leave any of his hands, because the owners of the vessel are liable. No protection is necessary to the seamen for these purposes, and, therefore, the tax imposed upon that useful class is both odious and unnecessary. That tax (Mr. C. observed) was not merely twenty-five cents, as the honorable gentleman [Mr. CUSHING] had stated; on the contrary, it was more than a dollar. As to the origin which had been assigned to these protections by the honorable member from Massachusetts, [Mr. J. Q. ADAMS,] Mr. C. desired that our flag alone should be a protection to our seamen, and not a paltry slip of paper, for which they were made to pay an onerous and odious tax. This was the chief cause of the last war, namely: that our flag was not itself alone a sufficient protection, that it was not sufficiently respected. But as to whether these protections could operate in warding off the calamity of war, Mr. C. ridiculed the idea. He (Mr. C.) must beg the honorable gentleman's pardon, [Mr. J. Q. ADAMS,] but really he must say that he [Mr. A.] appeared to him ever on the alert to watch each little speck upon the horizon, and make it out as if it were a cloud portending war; he [Mr. A.] could see nothing before him on that horizon but war and blood. These laws (Mr. C. said) he had thought for years past were unnecessary, and ought to be repealed; he hoped, therefore, they would be totally abolished.

The question was then taken on agreeing to the resolution as modified, and determined in the affirmative.

EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENTS.

Mr. WISE's resolution for the appointment of a select committee to inquire into the conduct of the different departments, together with Mr. PEABCE's proposed amendment to the same resolution, were the first thing in the orders of the day.

The resolution having been read, Mr. CAMBRELENG moved that its consideration be postponed till Thursday next, in order to take up several bills which he deemed of great importance.

Mr. DUNLAP protested against the further postponement of a decision upon the resolution. For weeks he had wanted to call the attention of the House to the business of his constituents, when its proper order should bring it up; and he was against interrupting the regular order of business in the manner proposed, to favor any particular bills before the House. Here was a resolution, he said, to which no member of the House ought to object, and least of all ought the friends of the administration, which had been attacked, and ought to court inquiry into its conduct, to resort to this expedient of postponement to prevent action upon it, &c.

Mr. CAMBRELENG repelled the charge of postponing this resolution in order to evade the question of inquiry. Not only in this, but in the last session, he had voted affirmatively on every question involving an inquiry into the affairs of Government; the only object he now had in view was the public benefit, as several bills relating to appropriations of immediate necessity were waiting to be passed. If, however, the House should seem to desire it, he (Mr. C.) would withdraw his motion to postpone.

The House was proceeding to the debate upon this resolution, when

Mr. PICKENS observed that, as he did not see the honorable mover of this resolution [Mr. WISE] in his seat, and as that gentleman, no doubt, would be anxious to watch the progress of the debate, and perhaps might wish to make a reply to what had been opposed to his resolution, perhaps it would be according to parliamentary use, and respectful to the mover, to postpone the subject until his return. He therefore moved that it be made the special order of the day for Thursday next.

At the suggestion of Mr. HARPER, Tuesday next was substituted, it being doubtful whether Mr. WISE would be in his seat on Thursday.

Mr. BOON hoped the consideration of this important subject would not be postponed another hour; for if it were much further postponed, it would be too late in the session to obtain the information to be called for.

[DEC. 28, 1836.]

The question of postponement was then put; and a division being called for, there appeared 98 for the postponement, and 51 against it. So the further consideration of the subject was postponed, and made the special order of the day for Tuesday next.

THE MINT AND COINAGE.

The House then again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill concerning the mint, (to consolidate all existing and some other regulations concerning the mint and coinage)—

The question being upon the motion of Mr. HARPER to strike out 140 grains, (the proposed weight for the new cent,) and insert in lieu of it 168 grains, (the weight of the present cent.)

The debate on this proposition was resumed, in which the motion was opposed by Mr. CAMBRELENG and Mr. McKIM, and supported by Mr. HARPER, and at more length and with great earnestness by Mr. ADAMS.

The motion of Mr. HARPER was finally agreed to without a division; and Mr. ADAMS then, as the section had been amended, withdrew his motion to strike out the section respecting copper coin.

Mr. HARPER then moved further to amend the bill so to reduce the minimum amount of gold and silver bullion receivable at the mint for coinage from two hundred to one hundred dollars; in support of which he made some cogent observations.

Mr. CAMBRELENG made no opposition to this motion.

The motion was agreed to, nem. con.

Mr. ADAMS then moved to amend the bill so as to raise the proposed weight of "the dime, or tenth part of a dollar," from 40 to 41½ grains, so as to make it correspond in weight with the weight of the new dollar, (412½ grains.) Unless this amendment was made, Mr. A. said, the bill would include the absurdity of declaring that the tenth part of 412½ was 40! Mr. A. protested, besides, against this debasement of the dime, one of the most useful of our coins, because it was entirely at war with the decimal system, as well as tending in practice to introduce confusion into the currency.

Mr. CAMBRELENG inclined to agree in the propriety of this amendment, being as much opposed as the gentleman from Massachusetts to depreciating the coin. The reduced weight had been introduced into the bill at the suggestion of the director of the mint, from a desire that these coins should be kept in circulation by being made less liable to be exported or melted up, and also because the coinage of small coins was more expensive to the mint than of the large.

The amendment moved by Mr. ADAMS was agreed to without a division.

The mint bill was then laid aside; and

The bill (before the same committee) for making further appropriations for the suppression of Indian hostilities was taken up and read through, no objection being made to it.

Both the bills were then reported to the House; and the amendments to the mint bill were immediately taken up for consideration.

The question being on concurring in the amendment which strikes out the provision making cents and half cents a legal tender for all sums less than a dime, it was opposed by Mr. GILLET, who maintained that if the coin was made, it ought to be a legal tender to some amount; if for no more, at least for half a dime; and he made a motion so to amend the bill.

Mr. ADAMS, suggesting that this amendment had been introduced on the motion of a gentleman now absent, proposed on that ground to postpone the further consideration of the bill, unless gentlemen would consent to let the bill pass as amended.

Mr. GILLET's opposition, however, was overruled by the House; and the amendment made in Committee of the Whole was concurred in by the House: Yeas 86.

Mr. GILLET then moved to strike out the 12th section, (being all that part of the bill which establishes the weight and value of the copper coin.) The motion was negatived, without a count; and

The bill, as amended, was then ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The Indian hostilities appropriation bill, as well as the bill making appropriations for payment of the revolutionary pensioners, were then also ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and

WEDNESDAY, DECEMBER 28.

POST OFFICE IN NEW YORK.

Mr. GIDEON LEE submitted the following:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads inquire into the necessity of erecting or otherwise procuring a fire-proof building in the city of New York, for the use of the Post Office Department as a post office.

The resolution having been read,

Mr. LEE said he knew well the impropriety of appending an argument to a subject-matter on reference to a committee for inquiry, but he desired the House to indulge him in saying a few words in this case. It was known to this House that an immense correspondence centres in the city of New York; the amount of property enveloped in this correspondence is very great—the bank notes, bills, foreign and domestic, executed and unexecuted contracts, papers emanating from the courts of judicature, and other public documents—and although all in transitu, the aggregate amount always at rest in that office, and liable to conflagration, is incalculable. It is true that the comparatively isolated position of the present office renders it more safe than many other locations would be, but by no means secure.

Mr. Speaker, from causes beyond the control or the guidance of the people, that city, more than any other, has suffered by fire; and I fear the appellation of "the city of fires," which some have been pleased to style it, is not so great or so strained a misnomer as we could wish it to be.

I compute the ownership of the property in that office, by the best data within my reach, to be about one seventh or one eighth part in the citizens, and the great balance is owned by the people of all the States, from Louisiana to Maine, from Missouri to Virginia. The loss of that kind of property, gentlemen know as well as I do, is irreparable. No man can be more careful or more faithful than Mr. Coddington, the present incumbent there; but no care, no measures, short of a fire-proof building, will insure security.

The resolution was then concurred in.

FOREIGN CONSULS.

Mr. VANDERPOEL submitted the following, which was read:

Resolved, That the Committee on Foreign Affairs inquire into the expediency of abolishing the offices of agent of claims at Paris and London.

Mr. V. said he had a single word to say in regard to this resolution. It would be remembered that we had for years gone on and paid to the consuls at London and Paris each $2,000, as agents of claims. He could not learn that there was any law in the statute book to create this office of agent of claims. Although there may, originally, have been some American citizens, to require some agency from the consuls at London and Paris, yet he was not aware that there remained any more claims longer to justify this allowance. At all events, he wanted the thing called by its right name. If you say you will allow to each of these consuls $2,000 per year, as consuls, be it so; but call them not agents of claims. It would be recollected that last year we passed an act for the relief of the consul at London, by which it is said that about $3,500 is annually to be allowed to him for office rent, clerk hire, fuel, &c. This, in addition to his $2,000 as agent of claims, and his fees of office, making his income nearly or quite equal to that of your resident minister. He felt it his duty to call the attention of the House to this subject.

EXTENSION OF THE PENSION SYSTEM.

Mr. TAYLOR submitted the following:

Resolved, That the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions be instructed to inquire into the expediency of amending the third section of the act entitled "An act granting half pay to widows or orphans, where their husbands or fathers have died of wounds received in the military service of the United States, in certain cases, and for other purposes," approved July 4, 1836, so as to extend the provisions of that section to all widows of officers and soldiers of the war of the Revolution whose husbands were entitled to a pension, excepting cases of second marriage after the termination of the war.

The resolution having been read, Mr. T. addressed the House as follows:

Mr. Speaker: Before taking the question on this resolution, I ask the indulgence of the House while I submit a few remarks. I had prepared a resolution, instructing the committee to inquire into the expediency of extending the provisions of the act to those widows of officers and soldiers of the war of the Revolution whose marriage took place previous to the close of the war; whereas the act of the last session gives a pension only to those widows whose marriage took place previous to the expiration of the last term of military service of their husbands; but having received some communications upon the subject, and upon further reflection, I have been induced to alter it in the manner as now presented. I have done so from a deep conviction that if there is justice or propriety in extending the pension system to the widows of pensioners, as now provided by law, there is equal justice and propriety in extending it in the manner proposed; and, indeed, sir, I may say there would be great injustice in withholding it.

The act which it is proposed to amend, I believe, passed without opposition, or at least with great unanimity. There was manifest in the House a strong disposition to extend the pension system to the aged widows of the soldiers of the Revolution; and I am inclined to the opinion that, if more time had been allowed, more deliberation bestowed upon the subject, the act would not have been as limited in its provisions as it now is. I believe I may say, without fear of contradiction, that no legislation by Congress meets more decidedly and cordially the approbation of the people of these United States than does that which extends the liberality, the justice, of this nation to that class who yet linger among us, and who were participants directly, or even indirectly, in the privations, the sufferings, and the sacrifices, of the war of the Revolution; and I rejoice, sir, that it is so; for it indicates that deep and abiding gratitude which flows from a just sense and due appreciation of the great benefits which they obtained, a cherishing of the principles which they taught, and a veneration and attachment to the institutions which they established. This truly American feeling may well be indulged, and should be gratified, especially as we have so abundantly the means of gratifying it; for, while it confers upon the aged and worthy remnant of a race of patriots and heroes some just reward for meritorious services and sacrifices, it cherishes and cultivates those sentiments of respect and attachment to the political doctrines and principles of a purer age, which tend to the security of freedom and the safety of the Union. And why, sir, have you extended your pension system to the widows of those who were entitled to a pension? It is because they, too, have made sacrifices in the cause of their country; it is because they have endured hardships and encountered dangers for their country's freedom; it is because they have united their fortunes and identified their interests, from early life, with those who fought your battles. It is because of the encouragement which they gave and the influence which they exerted—an encouragement which never faltered in the gloomiest period of that war, and an influence which was felt wherever there was a tented field, a battle-ground, or a soldier to be enlisted for the service. The patriotism, the zeal, ay, and enthusiasm of that day, were not confined to those by nature constituted to endure the hardships of a soldier's life, but pervaded all classes of society, and were conspicuously manifested by the gentler sex; no matron or maid, in the proudest days of Spartan valor, would, as the blush of wounded pride mantled on her cheek, have turned with more of scorn and indignation from the coward who had basely fled from the defence of his country, than would the American women of that period have turned from him whose treachery or cowardice had thrown disgrace upon him. And this influence was powerful in the success of the war; it animated the heart, it nerved the arm of the soldier, and prompted him to deeds of daring and of valor.

But, sir, I need not dwell upon the merits, the influence, and the sacrifices, of the American women of revolutionary times; for you have already settled the principle, that the widow of the pensioned soldier of the Revolution is entitled to a continuance of that bounty of the Government which her husband enjoyed; but you have, as I humbly conceive, unjustly confined it to those, and those only, whose marriage took place previous to the last military services of their husbands. And, sir, is this fact, the fact of marriage previous to the last military services of the soldier, so important as to settle the question whether the widow is entitled to the pension which her husband enjoyed? Should that fact, I ask, be the test by which you are to determine the justice or the expediency of continuing the pension to the widow? It appears to me not, sir. Neither do I conceive that marriage previous to the close of that war is the just criterion by which this question should be decided. If the wife of the soldier, while he was perilling his life in the service of his country, was suffering at home many and great privations, and participating largely in sympathy, anxiety, and solicitude for the safety of her husband, and the success of the cause in which he was engaged, is entitled to the inheritance of that annuity which you since, of right, have granted her husband while living, how much less worthy this favor is the widow who, although at that period she might have stood in no other relation than that of the affectionate daughter, the anxious sister, of those who were hazarding all in their country's cause, and who, after participating, perhaps, equally in the sufferings peculiar to those times, at the close of the war united her fortune for life with that of the war-worn soldier, or the affianced maid, whose marriage, from motives or prudence, advice of friends, the perils of the times, and anxiety for the cause in which all were engaged, was deferred until patriotism and valor were crowned, and peace and tranquillity restored to the country? And yet, by your present law, the one is entitled to a pension, while the others are deprived; and the number of this class is not comparatively small. Sir, those days were not so much days of marrying and giving in marriage as they were of toil, of suffering, and of bloodshed, in a glorious cause; and if the facts could be precisely known, I doubt not it would be found that, with those actually engaged in the service of their country, more marriages were consummated soon after the war than during the entire period of the Revolution; and yet you deprive the widows of all such of that bounty which you bestow upon the others. Is this equal justice? Is it right?

But, sir, my object is not to discuss the question at this time, but merely to bring the subject before the House, with the hope that the committee will give it their immediate attention, and report a bill in conformity to the suggestions of the resolution.

Mr. STORER remarked that the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions had had this subject under consideration, and would report a bill meeting the views of the gentleman from New York.

The resolution was then agreed to, nem. dis.

LAND BOUNTY TO OFFICERS OF THE LATE WAR.

Mr. HARD offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Public Lands be instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing by law for granting to each of the disbanded officers who served in the late war with Great Britain a quantity of land, according to rank, as a remuneration for sacrifices and services rendered by them in that war.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, said he was opposed to the adoption of the resolution. It held out, as he thought, delusive hopes to the officers who had served during the late war. A similar proposition had frequently been submitted to the House, but had never been favorably received or acted upon, so far, at least, as his recollection went. He thought that it would be utterly inconsistent with the duty which the House owed to other classes of our citizens, to grant lands according to the terms of this resolution. What claims had these officers on the Government? Had a bounty been promised to them when they entered the service, or had they at any time been induced to believe that such a bounty would be given? There was no law authorizing such an expectation, or justifying such a belief. Why, then, should the hope be held out? Did gentlemen propose to give these officers a gratuity? for it amounted to that, and nothing else. If a bounty was proposed at all, let it be extended to those who were deserving of it; deserving, he meant, on the score of necessity. How many people were there within the limits of the United States who would be entitled to it, on the score of necessity, much more than these officers? He hoped no such resolution would be adopted. If it was adopted, he hoped the committee and the House would both reject the proposition. The resolution held out delusive prospects, and for this reason he was opposed to it.

Mr. HARD said he hoped the resolution would be allowed to pass without opposition, because it was a mere resolution of inquiry. He was compelled to differ with the gentleman from North Carolina as to the manner in which these propositions had been received by the House at various times.

Mr. H. was understood to say that the proposition had received the favorable report of two committees of two Congresses, although the bills which accompanied the reports had never passed. The reason was, that it came up at a period of the session when there was not time to act upon it. He would not now, however, enter into the merits of the case. He did not know but what, if a proper investigation should be made by a committee, he might himself oppose the proposition, although his present impressions were now favorably inclined towards it. The country was now in a situation to compensate those individuals who had served it during the period of its travail and its perils. Probably the very reason why the bounty was not granted before was, because the country was in debt and unable to grant it. But now, when our Treasury was full to overflowing, and the only question was how we were to dispose of our money, and when there was such a struggle for the distribution of public lands among speculators and those who were not worthy of them, he thought the time had come when an investigation ought to be made, with a view to ascertain whether or not it was right to do something for the class of men referred to.

Mr. A. MANN said that, generally, he was in favor of the views which had been expressed by the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. WILLIAMS;] but, on the present occasion, he thought his [Mr. W's] views were too rigid. In every emergency of our country, Congress had liberally appropriated lands to the officers of our army. Was not Congress every year legislating for officers of the Virginia line? Congress had granted lands to the soldiers of the last war; should it be refused to the officers? He did not say he was in favor of the proposition; but he was in favor of inquiry, and of having all the information which the industry of the committee could collect, so that the House might better ascertain whether the bounty should be given or not.

The policy of every State had been to reward, with a liberal hand, those who had perilled their lives in defence of their country. What was it that nerved the arm of the British soldier in time of danger and of battle? It was the knowledge that, if he fell, his country would provide for his wife and his children. Mr. M. hoped the resolution would be adopted.

Mr. HARDIN was in favor of an inquiry into the subject. The officers of the revolutionary war, it was well known, had been but badly paid, in a depreciated coin, of little or no value; and, to induce them to continue in the service, the State of Virginia, in the year 1779, had given lands to those who were willing to serve to the end of the war. That State, with what policy he would not say, but with great liberality, had ceded to the United States nearly all the lands which she owned; and she was unable to comply with her contract. Under these circumstances, the United States had thought it their duty to pay the debt which Virginia had contracted. But, as regarded the officers of the late war, they were paid in a sound, substantial, solid currency. Mr. H. here specified the particular mode of payment, &c.

Had any promise been made of this bounty? None. Was the Government under any obligation to give such bounty? None. The United States had complied with their agreements, and had paid these officers liberally.

Mr. H. thought that, if bounty lands were to be thus given to the officers of the regular service, they might as well be extended to officers of the militia. He would venture to say that, if this system of giving bounty lands was once commenced, there would be no trouble hereafter about the surplus revenue, nor any necessity to hunt out articles on which to reduce the tariff. He hoped that the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WILLIAMS] would withdraw his opposition, and let the inquiry be made. But when the subject came up for discussion, the gentleman from New York [Mr. MANN] would find that he (Mr. H.) had not taken a new view of radical principles.

Mr. CRAIG thought that, if the inquiry was permitted by the House, the impression would be spread abroad that Congress would give this bounty. It would be much better to reject the proposition decisively, than to hold out delusive hopes. He was therefore opposed to the inquiry. As to the character of the officers of the late war, he had nothing to say. But the question was, ought Congress to give this grant on grounds of policy? Did good policy, or a compliance with any compact, require it? Certainly not. Nor could it be given, as in the case of Virginia land warrants, on the supposition that there was a scarcity of officers. Such, it was well known, was not the fact. He moved to lay the resolution on the table.

Mr. CHAMBERS, of Kentucky, called for the yeas and nays on that motion; which were ordered, and, being taken, were as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. John Q. Adams, Heman Allen, Bailey, Barton, Black, Bockee, Boon, Borden, Brown, Buchanan, Bynum, John Calhoun, Cambreleng, Campbell, Carr, Carter, George Chambers, Chaney, Nathaniel H. #### DEPOSIT BANKS.

Mr. GARLAND, of Virginia, moved the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury communicate to this House, if within his power, the dividends and surpluses which were declared by, and the surpluses and contingent funds remaining in, the several banks in which the public money is deposited, for the years 1833, 1834, 1835, and 1836, severally.

The House having agreed now to consider this resolution, a discussion took place on the question whether the inquiry should also extend to the expenses of the banks as well as to their profits; an amendment to this effect having been offered by Mr. GILLET.

Mr. WADDY THOMPSON opposed this amendment. He deemed it of no manner of consequence what the expenses of the banks might have been. The object of the resolution was to ascertain their net profits, and their expenses would of course be first deducted. If an inquiry of this nature should be instituted, Mr. T. flattered himself it would bring to light a system of corruption so vast and so extensive that no country whatever, be its people ever so virtuous and honest, could possibly stand before such a power of corruption. Mr. T. proceeded to instance the case of a little bank in Michigan, with a very small capital, which bank had received eight hundred thousand dollars of deposit, though not entitled, according to its capital, to more than a very small proportion of that amount. After a few more observations,

Mr. HARLAN moved to amend the amendment of Mr. GILLET by adding as follows: "and that he state also whether the salary of an agent at the seat of the General Government compose a part of the expenses of said banks, the name of the agent, and the several sums paid him by said institutions, respectively."

Mr. HANNEGAN moved to lay the resolution on the table.

A motion to adjourn was made by Mr. BOON, and decided in the affirmative.

So the House adjourned without passing upon Mr. GARLAND's resolution.

THURSDAY, DECEMBER 29.

NATIONAL CURRENCY.

The House proceeded to the consideration of the following memorial, presented at the last session of Congress, and laid on the table, and again brought to the attention of the House yesterday by Mr. GALBRAITH:

To the honorable the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled:

The memorial of the undersigned, citizens of Pennsylvania, respectfully represents: That we, in common with a large portion of our fellow-citizens, have, for some time past, viewed with some degree of alarm the rapid encroachments of incorporated companies upon the liberties and rights of the people, particularly those established for the purpose of banking. As the system now exists in the several States incorporating companies for that purpose, it destroys, as we conceive, the design of the constitution of the United States, which prohibits the States from coining money, emitting bills of credit, &c. The notes or bills of those banking companies, incorporated by the States, are rapidly taking the place of the constitutional currency of the country—gold and silver—and a continued fluctuation and uncertainty produced in the circulating medium, which the constitution intended should be steady and permanent. Under these circumstances, we beg leave, respectfully, to suggest to the consideration of Congress the propriety of proposing an amendment to the constitution of the United States, for the adoption of the several States, restricting the incorporation of banking companies, and limiting them in their issues of bank notes. We wish not to be considered as asking for any powers being given to Congress to incorporate companies of this description, but simply the restricting of the States. We are opposed to the increase of power in the National Government, or a consolidated Government; but if the system before mentioned be permitted to progress as it has for the last few years, we apprehend the consequences to the community may be serious, and dangerous to the stability of our republican institutions.

Your memorialists beg leave further to represent, that they have understood that the new Bank of the United States, chartered by the Legislature of Pennsylvania, is now reissuing the notes of the old Bank of the United States, in which the United States was a stockholder to the amount of one fifth of the stock; thus unwarrantably and fraudulently, as we believe, involving the faith and credit of the United States, bringing this State into collision with the other sisters of the confederacy, and calculated to produce confusion and disorder in the circulating medium of the country. Your memorialists, therefore, beg leave to call the attention of Congress to the subject, to inquire whether the fact be as has been reported; and if so, if there are any means in the power of Congress, to prevent such gross and improper practices upon the Government. And your memorialists, as in duty bound, will ever pray, &c.

This memorial Mr. GALBRAITH having moved to refer to a select committee, and the question upon that disposition of it having been stated from the Chair—

Mr. GALBRAITH said: It is with great reluctance that I rise on the present occasion to address the House on presenting this memorial from a portion of my constituents, and asking for it that reference which I have moved. I am aware that the time of this House, at the present period, is precious; but inasmuch as the object and purpose of the memorialists seem to be strenuously resisted by some, and by others not exactly comprehended, I feel myself called upon, by a sense of duty and respect which I owe to them, to submit a few remarks in explanation of the views entertained by the memorialists, as I understand them.

I shall, in the first place, endeavor to show that this memorial, from the source from which it comes, and the subject on which it asks the inquiry of this body, is entitled to a respectful consideration, and a reference to some committee; and, in the next place, I think I shall be able to satisfy the members of this House that the appropriate direction is that which I have proposed in moving that it be referred to a select committee.

Mr. Speaker, the memorial comes from a portion of the respectable and intelligent citizens of this Union, residing in the State which I have the honor, in part, to represent. It is clothed in respectful and appropriate language, and suggests considerations of deep and vital importance, not only to themselves and those of the State of Pennsylvania, but to the whole people of this wide-spread confederacy.

The memorial embraces two distinct subjects of inquiry; either of which, I apprehend, is of sufficient magnitude and importance to demand the grave and deliberate investigation of this body. The first is that of an amendment to the constitution of the United States, to be proposed to the Legislatures of the several States, restricting the incorporation of banking companies by the States, and limiting such as may hereafter be incorporated in the issues of bank paper money. This proposition necessarily involves the inquiry, how far the constitution as it now stands, in those clauses which provide that "the Congress shall have power to coin money, regulate the value thereof and of foreign coin, and fix the standard of weights and measures;" "to provide for the punishment of counterfeiting the securities and current coin of the United States;" and that "no State shall coin money, emit bills of credit, make any thing but gold or silver coin a tender in payment of debts," contains a prohibition to the States to incorporate companies with authority to issue bank notes, or, in other words, bills of credit, and form an agreement or compact, already made on the part of all the States, not to incorporate such companies. Without expressing, at present, any opinion of my own, or any indication on the part of the memorialists on this branch of the inquiry, I will barely remark that the constitution has been construed, by some of the best political writers and economists this country has produced, as containing such prohibition or compact, (a constitution being neither more nor less than a compact or agreement.) Among those are names intimately connected with the constitution itself. Is there not strong reason to conclude that such was the intention of those who framed the constitution? They had experienced the evils of an uncertain currency; they had witnessed the derangements and confusion of bills of credit issued under the Provincial Government, each province issuing bills of credit, according to its own circumstances, without regard to those of the others, and often very different in quantity and value. And they had also witnessed the no less fluctuation and evil results from the enormous issues and ruinous depreciation of the continental paper. The same clause in the constitution which yields to Congress, the general Legislature for the whole of the States united, the power of fixing the standard of "weights and measures," surrenders to it the power "to coin money, regulate the value thereof and of foreign coin." Is there not the same reason that the standard of value or price should be uniform, and the same throughout all the States, as the standard of weight or that of measure? neither of which would probably be so, or, in the nature of things, could be so, without giving the power of regulation to the National Legislature. The provision was framed and adapted to a state of circumstances as they then existed; the States had, individually, on their own responsibility, and according to the wants or caprices of its Provincial Legislature, emitted "bills of credit," which circulated as money, became the circulating medium of price; and what the price was in one province was not the same in another. Against this, the framers of that instrument provided that "no State shall coin money, emit bills of credit," &c. It did not, perhaps, occur to them that the States would separately and individually authorize incorporated companies, infuse life into soulless bodies of their own creation, to do indirectly what they were prohibited from doing directly, by the solemn compact agreed to by all.

But, sir, it is true, a different construction has practically obtained in most of the States. Companies incorporated by the different State Legislatures have grown up almost in every quarter, authorized to issue "bills of credit," or paper money, virtually supplying the circulating medium throughout the Union, necessarily and unavoidably varying the standard of value according to the amount and denomination of their issues. In some of the States, they are authorized to issue bills of the denomination of one, two, and three dollars; in others, limited to five dollars, as the lowest denomination; and in others, progress is making to fix ten dollars as the lowest denomination. In some, seven, eight, or ten paper dollars, at times, represent one of specie; in others, two or three; and in all, different at different times, and according as circumstances may operate upon them, the same evils, the same fluctuation and uncertainty in the standard of price, or rather the same want of standard of value, against which the constitution was intended to provide. What is worth nominally $3,000 this year may, through the operations of those companies alone, be worth but $1,000 next. The price of labor and every product or commodity is controlled and governed according to the interests or the caprices of those incorporated companies; and the whole sovereignty, so far as regards the regulation of the currency, is, to all intents and purposes, surrendered to them; and every individual in the community, whether farmer, mechanic, merchant, or manufacturer, placed at their mercy. How far this state of things has been effected by the active vigilance and constant attention of the speculating few, always awake to their own particular interests, gradually framing and fitting up this complicated and delusive machinery, while the industrious many were better employed, need not now be particularly inquired into; it is sufficient that it exists, and that it does will not be denied by any one acquainted with the affairs of this community. If it be granted, therefore, that the constitution does not prohibit the incorporation of companies by the States, to "emit bills of credit," it is only on the assumption that circumstances, as they then existed, did not require it. Is it not as important now to inquire and provide for a state of circumstances as they now exist as it was then? The evil is the same; and is it not subject to the same or similar remedy? The memorialists do not ask that any power should be vested in the General Government to incorporate banking companies, nor do they suggest an absolute prohibition of such power in the States; the former they expressly repudiate, and do not indicate the latter. All they seek is an inquiry how far good policy and the safety and permanency of the currency, and its uniformity throughout the Union, require that this power in the States should be restrained and limited, to effect the general good of the whole. The importance, the vital importance, of every consideration touching the circulating medium of the country, affecting more or less the interests of every man, cannot be doubted.

If the importance of the subject, sir, is sufficient to entitle it to the deliberation of this House, the next inquiry is, to what committee can this branch of it be most appropriately referred? It looks to a constitutional remedy, a provision in the fundamental instrument itself. None other can be provided. This may and can, as well as as effectually now, to meet the circumstances now, as the constitution already formed provided against the circumstances then. A proposition to amend the constitution is beyond the appropriate and peculiar inquiry of any of the standing committees. It is as broad and general in its character as the Government itself, and appropriate only for a select committee, raised for the purpose; and such has been the invariable practice here, for years, on all such propositions. Why, then, should not this proposition receive a similar direction with all others of a similar character?

The second subject of inquiry, Mr. Speaker, to which your attention is called by the memorial, is that of the reissues of the notes of the Bank of the United States, since the expiration of its charter for all purposes except that of continuing its corporate name, to use and be used in order to close up the concerns of the institution. Notes issued by that bank, while this Government was a stockholder to the amount of seven millions of the stock, previous to the 4th of March, returned for redemption, and redeemed, it is said, have been again issued and thrown into circulation. It is perhaps known to the members of this House that, in the month of February last, shortly before the expiration of the charter under the act of Congress of the 4th of March, 1816, by which it was incorporated for twenty years, an act of the Legislature of the State of Pennsylvania was passed, incorporating the same stockholders, except the United States, under the same name, and with the same amount of capital, thirty-five millions, for thirty years. One set of officers were elected for the old bank, in which the United States is a stockholder of seven millions, and a set of officers, being many of the same, for the new State bank, in which the United States is not a stockholder. The now president of the old bank, (Matthew L. Bevan,) I believe, is a director of the new bank; and the former president of the old bank, now president of the new one under the State, (Nicholas Biddle,) I believe, is one of the directors of the old bank. Several of the directors of the old are also directors of the new one, so that they may for all practical purposes be considered as the same men, although constituting two different boards of direction. Their legitimate duties are distinctly different. The proper business of the officers of the old bank is to wind up its affairs, to call in the notes of that bank, redeem from its proper sources the funds of the old bank, and cancel the paper as having been returned and redeemed. The business of the new bank is to issue its own notes, on the responsibility of its own officers and its own stockholders, unconnected with the old bank, in which this Government was a large stockholder. Now, if the officers of the old bank, many of them being the same individuals as the officers of the new one, instead of cancelling the old notes when redeemed, reissue the same through the new bank, as the President of the United States justly observes in his last annual message, it is either a fraud upon the Government or upon the people. If the notes are to be redeemed a second, third, or fourth time, out of the funds of the old bank, what can it be but a downright fraud upon the Government, being a stockholder and a sharer in those funds, and not in those of the new one? The funds of the old bank must, of course, now become exhausted; and the Government, instead of receiving her just proportion of the stock and profits, suffer the loss of having them applied to the redemption of the same notes which had been over and over again redeemed before. If the reissued notes are to be redeemed out of the funds of the new bank, the holder has not the security for their redemption which the notes purport to give; or, rather, he has no security at all; they were a gross and palpable deception upon him. The old bank, with the Government as a partner, bound in good faith and honor, whose notes they purport to be, and whose credit they bear, has once redeemed them, and therefore ought not to be bound again. The new bank is not bound for their redemption, because they are not its proper issues, and its obligation is not given, and it could not be made legally liable. It is true that, as long as it is the interest of the new bank to redeem such reissues, they would most probably be redeemed; but should an honest holder of such notes be subject to the mere will of such an institution, to decide whether he should receive his just debt or not, and be made to depend upon its interest, whether he had or had not a good security for payment? Such a conclusion would be cruelty. If such reissues consist of notes of the denomination of five dollars, they are a glaring evasion of the provisions of its State charter, which prohibits its issuing notes of less denomination than ten dollars.

Sir, shall we, the representatives of the people, so far as this Government is concerned, sleep and slumber at our posts, and look calmly with indifference upon a practice such as this, both upon the Government and upon the community? Shall it be said that there is no remedy in the power of Congress? That we have nothing to do with the State institutions of Pennsylvania? I admit that, so far as regards the State bank issuing its own notes, upon its own responsibility, we have nothing to do with it, and have no control whatever over it; but I am not prepared to admit that such is the case with regard to the old bank, chartered by Congress, and its officers. Although it has ceased for some purposes, that of discounting notes and issuing its paper, &c., it still exists for other purposes, that of winding up its affairs, settling with its debtors, creditors, and stockholders, and redeeming its floating paper, and still under the regulation of the power which gave it birth. Were the act of 1816, granting the charter, even silent on this subject, it would follow, as a matter of course, that the mode and manner of winding up its concerns should be placed under the direction of Congress; but that act contains an express provision, in its 17th section, "that Congress may, at any time hereafter, enact such laws, enforcing and regulating the recovery of the amount of the notes, bills, obligations, or other debts," &c.; and this power exists as well after the expiration of its charter, for the purpose of a final settlement and liquidation of its affairs, as before. Is it not, then, competent for Congress to legislate so as to regulate and control, and even punish the conduct of the officers of the old bank? And if they so far mismanage its affairs as to authorize or permit its notes to be reissued and put again into circulation, after they have been once redeemed, I ask if it is not a fair and legitimate subject for the legislation of Congress, and one which demands our serious and grave deliberation? Again: at the last session of Congress, an act was passed authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury, as the agent of the Government, to settle the claim of the United States, as a stockholder, with the bank. By his report, which has been laid upon your tables, it appears that duty has been discharged, as far as it could be on his part; but no satisfactory information has been given by the officers of the bank how much is due to the Government, or when or in what manner it shall be paid. Instead of settling up the affairs of the institution with the Government, its largest stockholder, now no longer a stockholder, according to the provisions of the act of Congress of last session, we find its officers, (if what is said be true, and it has not been denied,) being also officers of the new bank, practising a gross fraud upon this Government and this nation, treating with neglect and contempt your agent authorized to settle with them; and its president, at the head of the great broker fraternity, commencing an unprovoked attack and making war upon the measures of your administration. I do not desire that the proposition I have made should be drawn into a partisan discussion or assume a political character; it is one which affects the great interests of the country, and in that light only do I wish it to be considered, and in that point of view it must be apparent to every one as demanding mature and grave consideration, as well as prompt and decisive action. I am aware that it opens a field for discussion, upon which much might be said, to show the extent and depth of the evil, the various remedies which might be proposed, either those operating by mere inducement, or those by direct provision or legislative sanction. But I think I have said enough on this mere question of reference; it is time enough to go into more detail when the subject is referred, and brought back again on some distinct proposition.

Then, to what committee should this branch of the subject embraced in the memorial be referred? It may be said that all subjects relating to the Bank of the United States have already been committed to the Committee of Ways and Means, in the disposition of the President's message. But, sir, it is well known that the appropriate and legitimate duties of that committee are of a financial rather than a judicial or general character—to take into consideration propositions relating to the revenues of the country and appropriations of money. This part of the memorial seeks for legislative remedy against a supposed evil of a general nature, not peculiarly affecting the revenue, but the community at large; rather of a judicial than financial character, but partaking partly of both, and therefore not exclusively appropriate to either, but the proper subject for a select committee, more broad and general in its inquiries.

I have said thus much, by way of explaining the views and objects of the memorialists. I have endeavored to discharge my duty to them, as well as to the nation whose interests I am bound, as far as my feeble abilities will enable me, to serve, and whose constitution I am sworn to support. I have sought to give to the memorial the direction to which I thought it, from its importance and peculiar character, entitled. If its purpose be comprehended, I am satisfied. It remains for the House to give to it that disposition to which it may be thought entitled.

Mr. LINCOLN said that he hoped no such reference as had been proposed would be given to the memorial. His attention had been casually drawn to its character, and he trusted that, before any disposition was made of it, it would be better understood by the House.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GALBRAITH] had said that the memorial was of a various character. He (Mr. L.) believed that, when analyzed, it would be found to be of a very extraordinary character. Such an appeal, he would venture to say, had never before been made to the consideration of Congress. It was altogether peculiar and anomalous. It had been brought up from the files of a former session; and from an abstract of the contents of the paper, as given in the Globe of this morning, the House might learn something of its object.

It was his (Mr. L.'s) intention, before he sat down, to propose so to amend the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania as to send the memorial to the committee already appointed on the subject of amendments to the constitution of the United States; for it seemed to him to belong more properly to one of those pigeon-holes kept in reserve for matters of this description, than to the custody of such a committee as the gentleman from Pennsylvania had in view. From the manner in which the subject is now brought forward, as well as from the place of its origin, he feared there was something concealed and sinister to be accomplished. He asked the attention of the House to the character of the paper, as given in the abstract to which he had referred. It commenced with a lamentation on the encroachments of incorporated companies upon the rights and liberties of the people, and especially insists upon the danger to personal rights and civil liberty from the practice of the State Governments to create banking institutions. This is no less than an arraignment of State legislation. The wisdom if not the purity of the State Governments is impeached at the bar of this House, and that authority and discretion which have been exercised for nearly half a century, in the constitution of incorporated companies, comes now to be denounced as an abuse of power, dangerous to the liberties of the people. By whom (asked Mr. L.) is the power which is thus complained of exercised, and from whom is it derived? By the immediate representatives of the people, deriving all their authority directly, by delegation, from the people themselves. The complaint is a libel upon the good sense, the virtue, and the patriotism, of the country. And was it true that there existed in every part of the Union incorporated companies, which were continually encroaching on popular rights, while only some twenty individuals in the State of Pennsylvania were heedful of the danger, and all the rest of the community unconsciously slumbering over their injuries? The suggestion was unworthy of serious notice.

But (proceeded Mr. L.) these pure-minded and patriotic memorialists do not rest their allegations upon mere generalities. They point out to the attention of this House the specific violations of the constitution which State legislation has committed. The creation of banking corporations, say they, contravenes that provision of the constitution which prohibits the States from coining money and emitting bills of credit. National sovereignty is thus invaded, and the safeguards of the people violated! Surely the objection is presented here for the first time at rather too late a day for the intervention of the power of Congress to a prevention of the evil, if the application of that power could even have been so directed. Singular, however, as was the objection, when addressed to the consideration of this House, it had not altogether the merit of novelty. The gentleman from Pennsylvania, in his speech, has seemed, indeed, to give to it the sanction of his countenance. He (Mr. L.) remembered to have read, in the early history of banking institutions in his own State, something of a newspaper argument to the same point; but it had been overruled and repudiated by the judgment of wise and intelligent men, and by the uniform legislation of the States on the subject. Its serious repetition, as a practical rule of action, would now be scouted by every considerate politician in the country. He could not believe that any gentleman worthy of a seat on this floor would attempt to sustain for a moment an argument upon the objection.

But the memorialists complain of the abuses and perversions of the powers of chartered corporations, of the exclusive privileges and monopolies which they confer, and of their encroachment upon the just and equal rights of all the citizens. And what is the measure of remedy which the gentleman from Pennsylvania would propose by his select committee? Most certainly not the exercise of a supervisory authority by Congress over State legislation. This would more directly conflict with the constitution, which guaranties to the States the exercise of all the powers not granted to the Federal Government. If these powers are indiscreetly exercised by the States, redress is with the people; but if the ground of complaint be in the abuse of a limited and delegated authority, conferred by acts of incorporation, the appeal is to the source of that authority, the Legislature itself, or to the Judiciary. In either case, the remedy is not to be found here. It is at home, with the memorialists themselves, and the constituents of those who administer their Government; with the people, and those who are accountable to the people. Congress has no power over the subject. Did the gentleman from Pennsylvania pretend that Congress had such power? And was this the argument upon which this select committee was to be raised?

But he (Mr. L.) was desirous of calling the attention of the House more particularly to another part of the memorial. As if aware that neither the measure of prevention nor redress for existing grievances rested with Congress, these twenty or more memorialists gravely request that the assembled wisdom of the nation would propose to the States an amendment to the constitution of the United States, by which they may be restrained in the exercise of their own jurisdiction and sovereignty. The States were to be called upon to surrender the right which they had enjoyed for a period of time coeval with their existence, and under the authority of which institutions had been created in all the departments of business, and in aid of every important interest in the community. An amendment of the constitution, prohibiting the States from granting acts of incorporation.

Is there a man weak enough to believe that such a proposition would find favor with a single Legislature in the Union; or mad enough, in the present state of the business concerns of the country, to desire its success? What! ask a State Legislature to surrender a portion of its State sovereignty, to deny to itself a salutary power, lest it may be unwisely and unprofitably used; a power now become essential to the prosperity of the people, and without which there could be no security for present possessions, or hope of improvement in the future! But it may be said that the restriction proposed is of banking incorporations only, and the amendment would operate but a partial abridgment of a questionable authority. It is sufficient to reply, that the authority has been claimed and exercised by the oldest States, from the earliest period, and by the youngest almost as the first act of their sovereignty. Both its existence and its exercise have become indispensable to the welfare of the country. As well might the power of enacting municipal regulations be denied to the State Legislatures, as, in the present state of things, the right of granting to the operations of business the facilities of banking institutions be withdrawn. The gentleman from Pennsylvania himself, upon his own responsibility, will not venture to propose it. He adroitly and somewhat cautiously advocates sending the subject to an inquiry only, without suggesting an opinion of what should be the definite result.

But he (Mr. L.) would put it to the House to consider the effect of the proposition. An amendment to the constitution could have no retrospective operation. It could not impair the existence or the powers of banks already created. In restraining the States from further grants, it would but increase the influence and augment the power for mischief, if that was their tendency, as the memorialists assume, of such as were already in being. It would, indeed, be to create exclusive privileges, and constitute, during the continuance of pre-existing charters, odious moneyed monopolies. And was this the purpose the memorialists had in view? He would submit to the gentleman from Pennsylvania to answer.

Mr. L. contended that it was most obvious nothing of legitimate legislation could come of the reference of the memorial to a select committee of this House. The alleged abuses by the State banks, and the supposed danger to public liberty from the existence of such institutions, were subjects not within the cognizance of Congress. They belonged to, and might properly be addressed to the consideration of, the people. The proposition to amend the constitution in the particular pointed out in the memorial was too preposterous to be entertained for a moment. The gentleman who asks the reference will not do himself the discredit to advocate the measure. There must be something, then, in the motive for the presentation of the memorial, at this time, beyond that which meets the eye. A further reference to the document may explain the object—I would not be misunderstood, (said Mr. L.)—not the object of the gentleman, but of the memorialists; of persons not here, but elsewhere. If he recollected rightly the contents of the paper, it conveys a complaint of a violation of law by the Bank of the United States; and hence, probably, the inducement for an appeal to Congress. The Bank of the United States, say the memorialists, has reissued bills before redeemed, and which, by law, should thereafter have been excluded from circulation. What bank has committed this outrage upon public law, and what bills have been thus reissued? The Bank of the United States chartered by the authority of the State of Pennsylvania has reissued the bills of the Bank of the United States chartered by the authority of the Federal Government. Admitting the truth of the accusation, he, (Mr. L.,) upon his responsibility as a lawyer, would tell the gentleman from Pennsylvania that Congress had no power over the matter. He would plead to the jurisdiction. He denied the right of Congress to institute an investigation into the conduct of a bank deriving its existence and holding its powers from State authority, or of inquiring into any of its measures. The Bank of the United States incorporated by the State of Pennsylvania is such an institution. It owes no accountability to the Federal Government, and is amenable to no animadversion from this source. Whether it has issued its own bills, or reissued the bills of other banks, lawfully or unlawfully, it may well deride the authority of this body to take cognizance of the matter. It belongs to the Government of the State, and to that only, in its legislative or judicial department, to punish any infraction of its charter. If an offence consists in the facts charged by the memorialists, it is not for this House to apply the corrective. Nor can it be urged that the aspect of the case is changed by considering the federal Bank of the United States privy to the reissue of its bills by the State institution; for what rule of law does this violate? Is any gentleman here (inquired Mr. L.) so little conversant with the business of banks as not to know that these institutions are daily receiving the bills of each other, and as freely paying them out as their own original issues? The memorial alleges no agency of the federal bank in the act complained of; imputes no refusal to redeem its paper; charges no neglect of duty, or violation of obligation. What, then, is to be inquired into? That which, if admitted, constitutes no wrong in the corporation subject to your jurisdiction; and, if any crime in another, is entirely beyond your control.

Mr. L. proceeded, at some length, to show that the memorial contained nothing to which the inquiry of a committee could properly be directed, and that its presentation, at this time, was delusive and colorable, intended to cover other and unwarranted objects. It is not (said Mr. L.) in my nature unworthily to distrust the motives and suspect the honest purposes of others; and I beg again the gentleman from Pennsylvania to understand that I ascribe to him no improper views in this matter. But there may be those who, it may not be uncharitable to suspect, in the absence of all other discoverable motives, may intend more than the gentleman himself is aware of. It is possible, even, that this memorial is brought up, at this time, not for the purpose of correcting existing abuses, but for party political effect—not here, in this House, but elsewhere—at home, in the country, with the people of Pennsylvania.

This House (continued Mr. L.) need not be informed that it had been doubted by some gentlemen whether the power of the Legislature of Pennsylvania had been wisely exercised in the recharter, as it was termed, of the Bank of the United States as a State institution. This was a question with which he conceived the House had nothing to do. For himself, he had felt no personal interest in the fate of the old bank, and had no especial sympathy with those who mourned over its destruction; neither did he take any concern, such as the memorialists of Pennsylvania might indulge, in the new institution, which, like a phoenix, had arisen from its ashes. He had understood, however, that a proposition was before the Legislature of Pennsylvania to ascertain under what influences the new charter was obtained. It might aid the purposes of those who instigated that investigation, that a clamor should be raised in the House against the institution. It might be that, by getting up a report by a select committee, distrust was to be thrown upon all similar institutions in the country. It might be that the report of such a committee, properly constituted, would promote essentially the purposes of the inquiry in Pennsylvania. The banks might be discredited, the currency discredited, paper money refused, and the golden age, so authoritatively predicted and promised, confided in. He (Mr. L.) would not say that this was the end intended to be accomplished; but this he would say, there were those who would derive a weight of influence in favor of their opinions from the appointment of the committee, more especially in the event of a certain issue to their deliberations, which it would be most difficult to withstand. He, in short, greatly feared that the mere appointment of a committee, upon such vague suggestions as the memorial contained, would throw distrust over all banking institutions, and take away that little remaining confidence which was still cherished in the soundness of the circulating medium of the country. In this point of view, the subject was certainly deserving of the most serious consideration; and if the object proposed by the gentleman from Pennsylvania was only such as he has avowed, he would respectfully suggest that it might well be effected without giving to the most suspicious occasion for alarm. Let the gentleman accede to his (Mr. L.'s) proposed amendment to his motion, and send the memorial to the committee appointed to revise the constitution, without particular reference to the objects of these memorialists. If he will not consent to this, let him boldly assume the responsibility of the whole proposition, and offer a resolution declaring the expediency of restricting the States in the power of creating banking corporations, and be himself among the first to ask the consent of his own enlightened Commonwealth to its adoption, and the surrender of its own discretion to the dictation of federal power. If the dangers from banks and other corporations be such as the memorial represents, this will be laying the axe to the root of the mischief; for, by the wholesome reform of denying power to the States, there will be found the most effectual protection from its abuse. The gentleman himself might be hardly yet prepared for the application of so thorough a corrective.

Mr. L. concluded by moving to amend the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania by striking out the words "a select committee," and inserting "the select committee to whom was referred that part of the President's message which relates to a proposed amendment to the constitution of the United States, and also petitions and resolutions presented at the last and present session, on the subject of amendments to the constitution."

Mr. HARPER said his colleague had closed his remarks by saying that this was not a party measure, nor intended to operate on the present parties of the country. I wish (said Mr. H.) I could believe this as far as respects all who are concerned in getting up this memorial and bringing it before this House. It is now, as it originally was, I have no doubt, intended to bring the character and influence of this House to bear upon this question in another body, now engaged or expected to be engaged in an inquiry into the affairs of the United States Bank.

I shall not attempt to follow my colleague through the various ramifications and views that he has thought proper to take of this subject, but shall confine myself to the petition and such matters as necessarily grow out of it. This petition, which now seriously engages the deliberations and time of this House, is signed by twenty-eight names, not five, perhaps, of whom have the least knowledge of the operations of banking; and what do they ask? That Congress shall take into its hands and remodel the whole banking system of the United States. But, as this is not a subject which has heretofore been considered to be legitimately within the province of the official duties of Congress, I should not have adverted to it but for the purpose of showing how well those petitioners are acquainted with the subject to which they have thought proper to call the attention of this House.

Sir, my colleague has thought proper, in the course of his remarks, to comment on the depreciated state of the currency of the country. Without stopping to inquire how far he or the petitioners are correct in that respect, let us suppose that it is so that there has a depreciation in the currency taken place. To whom, I ask, are we indebted for that depreciation? To the present administration and its supporters, among whom my colleague has been one of the most zealous. When they assumed the reins of government we had a sound if not the very soundest currency in the world; when it was of a mixed character, of specie and paper combined. Well, sir, they set about to mend it; and how have they done it? They declared it to be their intention to give us a specie currency; instead of which, they have doubled the paper circulation, and now exclaim against and endeavor to transfer to their opponents the blame and responsibility for the evils they have brought upon the country. But it may be asked, how have the measures of the administration brought those evils upon the country? I answer, by the prostration of the United States Bank, an institution which they still continue to pursue with unabated rancor, because they have not been able entirely to destroy it. I may be asked, in what measure were we indebted to the United States Bank for the soundness of our currency at the time the Government passed into the hands of the present administration? I answer, that that bank, considering itself a national institution, felt it to be a part of its duty, as well as its interest, to preserve a sound currency in the country as far as it possibly could; to accomplish which it voluntarily subjected itself to considerable expense and the liability of sustaining heavy losses. This desirable object it accomplished in the following manner: Whenever it found, by the quantity of paper in circulation belonging to any bank, city, or State, that an overissue had taken place, the bank collected these overissues whenever they were to be found in the possession of its debtors, returned them on the institutions which had put them into circulation, and demanded payment. If the banks thus brought in debt were unable to pay, which was often the case, the United States Bank, instead of oppressing or straitening them unnecessarily, made arrangements with them, and, by receiving a reasonable interest, gave them time to redeem their notes by gradual curtailments. Thus, sir, they were restrained within proper limits, and a wholesome currency preserved in the country, while the United States Bank ran the risk, in case a failure should take place of any bank whose notes they held, of sustaining the whole loss of the notes then in its possession. This wholesome check has been removed by the present administration and its friends, and the consequence predicted by the opposition has followed. The country has become flooded with State bank paper, until the authors of the evil have themselves become alarmed, and now endeavor, by every wile and stratagem which they can invent, to transfer the odium to their opponents, who labored from the first to avert the evil.

But there is another subject which my honorable colleague and the petitioners have thought proper to bring before this House, with which, in my humble opinion, we have nothing to do. The United States Bank, which was chartered by the Legislature of Pennsylvania during the last session of that body, is gravely charged with re-issuing the notes of the United States Bank, the charter of which expired last March. Well, sir, suppose they have. Had they not a right so to do? Must the present United States Bank be deprived of a privilege that belongs to every other bank and individual in the United States? Suppose the bank in possession of a quantity of the notes of the old bank, which have been received in payment of debts due to the present bank, (and I am unacquainted with any other means by which it became possessed of them,) and an individual should be not only willing but desirous to receive these notes for a debt due from the bank to him, why should the United States Bank be deprived of the privilege of paying them out, any more than any other bank or individual in the country? I know of no reason except that the bank happens to be in bad odor with the present administration of the Union and its supporters.

Sir, the paper of this wantonly and unjustly abused and vilified bank is at this moment the best paper currency in the country. There is not a gentleman within the sound of my voice, from the South or West, that does not know that this paper is anxiously sought and purchased in their sections of the country, at from three to five per cent. premium. It is found to be the only paper with which they can travel through all parts of the country, without being subjected to inconvenience or loss by the payment of discounts during their journey.

But another idea is thrown out, Mr. Speaker: that the circulation of these notes by the present Bank of the United States will prevent the old bank from winding up its affairs, and subject the United States, in common with the other stockholders, to the liability of losses which they would not otherwise incur. Is this the fact? If it be, I should like to be told in what manner it can happen. The notes are liable to be lost or destroyed; will that be a loss to the stockholders? I apprehend not, as they will never have to pay them if they are not presented. This will be a gain instead of a loss to the bank, and consequently an advantage to the stockholders.

But will it prevent the bank from winding up its affairs? I apprehend not, sir. It is well known that every bank keeps a record of all the notes it issues, and that it must at all times hold itself prepared to redeem them. Now, let us suppose that this bank is desirous to wind up its affairs, and pay over the amount of stock and dividends due to the stockholders, and upon examination it finds that there is still a hundred thousand dollars of its notes in circulation. What, then, becomes its duty? Why, simply to set aside a hundred thousand dollars for the purpose of paying these notes as they shall be presented, and paying over to the stockholders the balance of assets which it may then possess, which is all to which they can lay any legal claim. Need I pursue this argument any further, to prove that the stockholders cannot possibly lose any thing by this operation, or that the winding up of the bank need not be delayed in consequence of some of its notes being in circulation? I have never been the advocate of banks of any description; but if we must have them, and I believe such is the general sentiment of the country, then let us not carry on a war against those that are best managed, and are calculated to do most good, and nurture those from whom we have most evil to apprehend.

Sir, the objects sought to be accomplished by the petitioners cannot be effected by this House without an alteration of the constitution of the United States, or the unsettling of the whole principles upon which your Government has been administered ever since the adoption of the federal constitution. They ask you to take away a power which the States have always possessed—that of granting bank charters. Have you a right to deprive the States of that power, without an alteration of the constitution of the United States? A negative to this question would, I believe, be almost unanimous throughout the Union. To what committee, then, should the petition go? I answer, to the committee already appointed, which has in charge the various amendments proposed to the constitution of the United States. If you send it to a select committee, what will be the object, and what have we to expect? A report that will contradict the assertion of my colleague, ("that this is not a party measure, or intended for party purposes.") You, sir, I predict, if you get a report at all, will get one of a most decided partisan character. Sir, I had no intention when I came in of saying a word on this subject, and regret that I have detained the House so long.

Mr. MANN, of New York, said he had no idea, when he stated on yesterday that he wished to have his friend from Pennsylvania gratified in his request, that this subject would create a debate taking so wide a range as that which the House had witnessed; and it was no part of his purpose now to extend it much further. He had perceived, however, a disposition in the House to become early possessed of some subject worthy of debate in that body, on which to hang speeches for the edification of the public. Mr. M. said he had not deemed this of such general interest, although he would admit its intrinsic importance; and he expressed the hope that the standing committees of the House would very soon be able to present to its consideration, and for its action, the important measures of the session. These he deemed were—the reduction of the revenue to the wants of the Government; the restriction of the sales of the public lands to actual settlers; the maintenance of our neutrality towards belligerent nations, more especially towards Mexico and Texas; and the annual necessary appropriations for the support of Government. When these subjects are before the House, honorable gentlemen will have a field wide enough to exercise their highest powers. The House would recollect (said Mr. M.) that his friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. GALBRAITH] had heretofore made some efforts to bring the subject of this petition before it and before the country, in which he had not been as successful as he (Mr. M.) thought he deserved. That gentleman had not often asked the House for favors of any kind; he had been as modest in that respect as most gentlemen representing the people on that floor. Mr. M. said he understood that his friend who presented this petition felt a deep interest in the subject, because the Bank of the United States of the State of Pennsylvania had established, or were about establishing, a branch of that institution in the district which he represented; and Mr. M. thought it but right that the gentleman should have an opportunity, as chairman of a select committee, to resist what he deemed an encroachment upon the rights of his constituents, by a great moneyed power. He desired, also, at the same time, to resist the extension of the paper system—of paper money—whether under the federal or State authorities, by an examination of the subject in reference to the spirit of our institutions. To this Mr. M. saw no well-founded objection, because it was not proposed by the petitioners, or the gentleman from Pennsylvania, to apply the powers of this Government to remedy the present evils, but to strike at the root, by considering the expediency of amending the constitution so as to prohibit the States, by their own consent, from granting banking privileges and profits by their legislation to one class of their citizens, (under the pretence of the public good,) which, in the nature of things, must be denied to all others. Sir, (said Mr. M.,) has not the paper system of this country extended itself far enough, identifying itself with all the interests of society in every department of trade, devouring the productive labor of those who submit to the laws of Heaven, and procure their bread by the sweat of their brows? Why is it, sir, that for the last ten or fifteen years the community has been kept almost constantly in a feverish condition respecting the currency, rendering their property and their productive labor insecure, by changing the standard of value, or rather destroying it? Has it not been principally owing to the fluctuations in our paper system, sometimes swelling itself like the full tides of the ocean, and then suddenly receding, carrying its thoughtless and careless votaries to the dark abodes of devouring avarice?

What is a proper remedy for this? asked Mr. M. Why, the gentleman from Pennsylvania, who has just resumed his seat, [Mr. HARRIS] finds it in a Bank of the United States, to regulate the issues of the subordinate factories, by driving their products home, and substituting their own, which, he believes, is the very best currency in the world. This remedy, sir, has usually increased the disease. Instead of regulating, restraining, or controlling, the paper issues by the State banks, it has increased them by the addition of its own issues falling into their vaults as capital. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LINCOLN] supposes that it is a libel upon the people to even entertain the idea of restraining the paper system in its operation, and does not seem willing to treat this petition with common respect. There are, sir, (said Mr. M.,) those in the State which in part he had the honor to represent, as well as in Massachusetts, who maintain that the greater part of the blessings vouchsafed from God to man come through a bank under their control. It has, however, been doubted there, by some, whether those blessings are not shaved and diminished before they effect the purposes designed by the Great Giver. This is not the case (Mr. M. presumed) with the constituency of the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts, and therefore he is clear that things are blessings to them, which are esteemed evils by most all others. Mr. M. said he could here make answer to the several positions assumed by the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts, which he trusted would be satisfactory; but he had already occupied the House much longer than he intended when he arose, and he could not deem it necessary or useful to detain it longer for such purpose. He hoped the petition would receive the same respect which was usually accorded to those which were in respectful terms.

Mr. PEARCE, of Rhode Island, was under the impression that, at the last session, this memorial was referred to one of the standing committees of the House. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GALBRAITH] takes it from the files in the Clerk's office, and again presents it to our consideration, because, for want of time, or from some other cause, it was not finally disposed of at a former session. Why (said Mr. P.) should it now receive a different direction? What has transpired to require this? Because it did not receive the action of a committee at a former session, it did not follow that it would not receive such action at the present session. To refer it now to a select committee would not, perhaps, be a direct censure upon one of the standing committees of the House; but he would submit to gentlemen whether it would be paying that deference and respect to a standing committee it was entitled to. To such a committee it legitimately belonged, and I (said Mr. P.) am not disposed to gratify my friend from Pennsylvania, or any other man, to take from committees what belongs to them. I have taken my stand upon this subject, and my friend from Pennsylvania will understand that it is not to oppose him that I object to his motion, but to maintain a consistency in my own course of legislation. Heretofore, select committees were not ordered as a matter of course, never without good cause; and not always when, in the opinion of many gentlemen, there has been good cause. Such has been the temper of the House in regard to them, and such has been the tenacity with which those who composed the standing committees of the House clung to what belonged to them. I regret to say that, at this session, there have been already appointed more select committees than I had ever before known during a whole session of the House.

I will for a moment examine the effect which will be produced by, and the consequences which will follow, the too frequent appointment of these select committees. One member wants a subject referred to a select committee, which is proper for the consideration of one of the standing committees of the House, because he, as the chairman of that committee, can have it under his special care, will be able to present it to the House in a fair light, and more speedily, for its action thereon. Well, sir, this, in the estimation of some gentlemen, may be all well enough; but are they prepared to say that one member shall have, by concession and the indulgence of the House, what shall be denied to another? If not, sir, then where and in what situation do we find ourselves? Every thing which any member has in charge must go, or certainly may go, to a select committee. Your standing committees may be ousted of their jurisdiction, and might as well be abolished at one time as at another.

There is withal a little right and a little justice involved in this consideration. Is it right, is it just, that an interest should be committed to those who are known, in advance, to be in favor of it? I think not; as you may not, in such a case, have that full investigation, and that fair and impartial representation, which may be had of one of the standing committees of the House.

For an illustration of my views I will (said Mr. P.) recur to what has taken place at this session, not to arraign the presiding officer of the House, who has, I know, done no more than conform to usage and the course of those who have preceded him, but to show the consequences of an order for a select committee. An honorable member from Kentucky, [Mr. HAVES], with an avowed hostility and opposition to the military school at West Point, honest and sincere, I have no doubt, in his convictions of the inutility of that institution, submits a proposition and inquiry which involve, or may involve, the further continuance of that institution, and prays for a select committee. Such a committee is ordered, consisting of nine members; and it is found that, of the nine, seven are friendly to the proposition submitted by the honorable gentleman from Kentucky, and unfriendly to the institution, and but two are the friends of the same.

I complain not of this, as the select committee was ordered, because it was organized according to the usages of the House, existing in the organization of such committees; but I do, Mr. Speaker, derive from it an argument, and I hope the House will see the full force of it, against the too frequent appointment of select committees.

I have often witnessed a spirit which well becomes them, evinced by those who are the heads of standing committees in the House, to claim all that belonged to them. I hope I shall see further manifestations of this spirit. We made at the commencement of the session a very good beginning. An honorable member from Alabama [Mr. LEWIS] moved a reference to a select committee of a subject which the veteran chairman of the Committee of Claims clearly showed belonged to that committee; and, by a very large vote of the House, the select committee was denied, and the subject was referred to the standing committee of which the honorable gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WRIGHT] is chairman. Why was this done? There was a general disposition on the part of the House, I have no doubt, to gratify the gentleman from Alabama; but it could not be done without a violation of our own rules, and encroaching upon the rights of a standing committee of the House.

But what, Mr. Speaker, are we called upon to do by those gentlemen memorialists, twenty-eight in number, comprising, I hope, not all the virtue and intelligence, purity of purpose, and integrity of character, yet remaining in the State of Pennsylvania? They complain of the increasing issues of bank paper money by incorporated companies in the different States; they wish Congress to inquire into the expediency of proposing an amendment to the constitution, restricting the incorporation of banks by the several States; they say that the notes of the Bank of the United States, which had been returned to the bank for redemption, and redeemed, had been reissued since the 4th of March last, when the charter of the Bank of the United States expired; and they pray, generally, for relief in the premises.

When (said Mr. P.) men are in mud and mire so deep that they cannot, in their opinions, extricate themselves without calling on their friends, it has been generally thought to be necessary for them to show, before they received the required aid, that the proper effort on their part has been made. Sir, can we confer upon these honest men any aid which they may not have and enjoy, independently of any action on our part? What says the constitution of the United States upon one of the subjects referred to us for consideration by these twenty-eight men? "Congress, whenever two thirds of both Houses shall deem it necessary, shall propose amendments to this constitution; or, on the application of the Legislatures of two thirds of the several States, shall call a convention for proposing amendments," &c. I would say, sir, to those honorable men, why is not this good work begun at home? Do not yet call on Hercules, for you have not yet shown that you have done all you were able to do.

I may be told that the Legislature of Pennsylvania is corrupt, and an appeal to that body would be an ineffectual one. Then I would say, appeal to the ballot-box; and if, perchance, I should be told that even there the proper relief could not be had, I would say to the people of Pennsylvania, adopt and carry into operation the suggestions of at least two of her Governors, Wolf and Ritner: establish free schools, and extend the diffusion of light and science; apply all that will to you belong, under our late distribution act, for the purpose of enlightening the rising generation. I repeat, sir, let the men of Pennsylvania begin their good work at home; for, in my opinion, it does not become them to put upon record their own infamy, their bribery, and their corruption, and the influence of Mr. Biddle and his bank over them.

Sir, I am sorry that the corrupting influences of the man or his bank are brought to our view: let every man have his due. Mr. Biddle says that he was quite indifferent about a recharter, by the Legislature of Pennsylvania, of the Bank of the United States. He made no application for a recharter; he neither corrupted nor seduced any one; that if any rapacious act was committed, it was by the Legislature upon him, and not by him upon them; and one would suppose, from his first letter addressed to my venerable friend from Massachusetts, that there would not have been any violence of any kind, but for the proceedings of the Pennsylvania Legislature. Surely, sir, these twenty-eight men do not wish us to save them from their own worst enemies, themselves.

It is, has long been, a mooted point, and I think it will long remain so, whether Congress, under the constitution, can in any way restrain or restrict the issues of bank paper by local banks. Deposit banks can be compelled to perform what they are bound by contract with the Treasury Department to do, and here I think the matter must end. I am not now prepared to say that Congress can, as the constitution now is, say to any State in this Union, you shall incorporate so many and no more banking institutions, and the issues of those incorporated shall be to such an extent as we may prescribe, and not beyond. Sir, I am not a very great stickler for State rights; at any rate, I have not said so much in favor of them as many others have said; but this I do say, that I am ready, and as well prepared as any man can be, to resist all encroachments upon State sovereignties, let them come from whatever quarter they may, and act, when there shall be an attempt here to restrain the Legislature of the State from which I come, in what we deem to be the lawful exercise of its powers, whether in incorporating banking institutions, or any other institutions, that attempt will be fairly met, not by me alone, and will be properly resisted. We are not yet driven to the necessity of declaring to the world our own infamy, and begging Congress, because we are corrupt, to take us under its protection, to act for us, and pass laws to restrain us in our infamous and corrupt course.

Sir, let it not be inferred from what I have said that I am in favor of the moneyed incorporations of the country. No, sir; I am opposed to them, and all other incorporations; and as I now am I always have been, and I verily believe I shall continue to be. What are they but additional facilities for the rich to oppress the poor, and, in their march to do it, to travel with steam power? for an irresponsible body, without soul, to do what no man, as an individual, with heart or soul, ever did or ever will do—to steal power from the many, to whom it belongs, and confer it upon the few, who never ought to have it, and clothe that few with the full possession and exercise of it? Sir, upon this subject I have nothing to disguise. I here avow my sentiments, as I have avowed them elsewhere; and I stand or fall by them, here and every where.

Sir, it may be very questionable whether power can be met by, or resisted by, any thing but power; and whether there is strength enough, if there be virtue and integrity sufficient, in the people of this country to meet or put down what may be called the major vis—the money power and the corporation power—except by meeting it with its own weapons, and opposing to it a force not unlike that which it wields. The people of my own State, (said Mr. P.,) one would suppose, have gone upon this principle; that is to say, to meet power of a certain kind by the exercise against it of a power of the like kind. Finding themselves, in the incorporation of bank institutions, “stepped in so far that returning would be as bad as to go o’er,” they are now, from necessity, to keep in a sound healthy state institutions created, obliged to create all that are asked for, that one may operate as a check to and counteract the evil tendencies and effect of the other.

Mr. Speaker, the Bank of the United States recently chartered by the Legislature of Pennsylvania is a creature of Pennsylvania. As we all take our wives, let them take that, for better and for worse, and not trouble us about bribery and corruption. If they have been bribed, or felt the corrupting influence of money, the sooner they are in a state which will enable them to resist the one or the other, the better for them. I thought at the last session, when we with great unanimity repealed one of the sections in the charter of the late Bank of the United States, which, in the opinions of some men, was operative, notwithstanding the expiration of the charter itself; operative so far as to compel receiving officers to receive the bills of that bank, in the payment of Government dues, we should not hear, in the form of direct communications, any thing more of the monster, and nothing more would be said of it, and nothing more would be done in regard to it, until we took the proper steps to make it disgorge what it had belonging to us. I have been mistaken.

In conclusion, said Mr. P., when in order to make that motion, I will move, and if now in order will now move, that this memorial be referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. DENNY said he rose to trouble the House with a remark or two, in consequence of the extraordinary ground taken by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. MANN.] I had supposed, from the motion made by that gentleman on yesterday, that his object was to submit at large some cogent and satisfactory arguments for indulging my colleague [Mr. GALBRAITH] with a select committee. He has not done this, however, and the only reason he has urged amounts to this: that it is apprehended some change may take place in the opinions of the constituents of my colleague; therefore the power of this House must be exercised to counteract it.

He says there is a special reason for granting the motion of my colleague; which is, that the Pennsylvania Bank of the United States is about to establish a branch in the district represented by my colleague; and this select committee is desired in order “to resist this encroachment on the principles of his [Mr. GALBRAITH’S] constituents, by this moneyed power.” I presume it is known to most gentlemen on this floor that the bank chartered by Pennsylvania has established a branch at the town of Erie, in the county of Erie, and within the district represented by my colleague.

But, sir, this branch was authorized by the Legislature of Pennsylvania, and I believe at the special instance and request of the constituents of my colleague. It was on the motion of the gentleman who represented the people of Erie county in the Legislature that the authority was given to establish this branch. It did not proceed from any spontaneous movement of the bank itself. This is termed an encroachment on “the principles of the constituents of my colleague.” And because the gentleman imagines this measure may produce a change in the opinions of many of the constituents of my colleague, and cause them to differ from him, therefore we must interpose the power of this House to prevent it. We are called on to interfere with the opinions of the people, where it is supposed they may differ from those entertained by their Representative here? Carry out the argument, the same reason would justify our interfering with the press. And gentlemen might with equal propriety call for the power of this House to be exercised to put down a press established in his district, because it might produce a change in the opinions or principles of his constituents. The doctrine is alarming, and claims for this House a power which I cannot concede to it.

If my colleague has views peculiar to himself on the subject mentioned in the memorial, and which he thinks important and worthy of being made public, the press is to open to him; he can freely communicate them through that channel. But I cannot agree that this House should lend its sanction to the doctrine contended for by the gentleman from New York.

If any disposition is to be made of the memorial, I have no great objection to sending the first branch of it to the committee indicated by the gentleman from Massachusetts. Yet I think the whole had better be laid on the table.

This memorial was gotten up last year, at a period of political excitement. The presidential election was approaching, and something was to be effected. That contest is now over, and this memorial might well have been left on the files of the House. So much of it as relates to an amendment of the constitution I am willing should be referred to the committee already having charge of propositions for that purpose.

With regard to the second part of the memorial, I am opposed to any reference whatever. In this part of the memorial we are called upon to interfere with a State institution. And for what reason? Because the bank chartered by Pennsylvania has received and paid out notes formerly put into circulation by the Bank of the United States chartered by Congress. Has not every bank a right to do this? The Pennsylvania Bank of the United States is distinct from the old Bank of the United States; they have different individuals as their presiding officers. Your power extends to the bank chartered by Congress; but you have no right to go into an examination of the affairs of the institution established by Pennsylvania; it is a State institution, not amenable to you, and over which you have no control. Large as are the powers of this House, they can extend only to those institutions connected with this Government. That established by Pennsylvania is beyond your jurisdiction, and exclusively within the jurisdiction of that State, and we cannot interfere with it.

Mr. CHAMBERS, of Pennsylvania, remarked that the memorial offered by his colleague [Mr. GALBRAITH] presented for the consideration of the House subjects of general as well as local interest—subjects that have elicited discussion, and will elicit more. In this memorial is asked an amendment of the constitution of the United States, in matters not affecting a portion of the people, or one part of the country, but an amendment that is to control the action and legislation of the State Legislatures and State authorities of all the States composing the Government, in relation to banking institutions and other corporations.

Another branch of this memorial proposes an investigation of the acts and proceedings of a Pennsylvania State institution, created and maintained by State authority; and the question now before the House, and which is the subject of discussion, is the reference or disposition to be made of this memorial, for which the mover asks a select committee to be raised.

It is to be considered whether it is deserving of a reference to any committee, from the character of the memorial, and the circumstances under which it is got up and presented. This memorial, signed by twenty-eight citizens of Pennsylvania, was presented at the last session of Congress, and, by a vote of this House, was laid on the table, where it was allowed to rest. It has, however, been raised from the tomb of the Capulets, to which it was supposed to be consigned, and again brought before the House by my colleague.

It has already performed its office: it was presented to the last Congress by him, with such remarks as he chose to make, and he has been allowed the opportunity of again presenting it, and making his remarks. This is enough, and as much probably as was expected, or ought to have been expected, for such a memorial.

It is, however, now asked and pressed that a select committee shall be raised for the special purpose of considering this memorial. It is unreasonable that a select committee should be formed and charged, under the direction of this House, with considering certain proposed amendments to the constitution, limiting State authority and State legislation in all the States, and abridging the rights of the people from one end of the Union to the other, on the application of twenty-eight petitioners from one State, whose memorial had been presented to the last Congress, and, by a vote of the House, laid on the table, without a reference to any committee. Without any fresh memorial from the people, without any indication of public sentiment on the part of the people on this subject of general interest, this House is asked to give my colleague, on this sleeping memorial, a select committee, to consider and report amendments of the constitution that shall restrain and limit State jurisdiction and legislation. It will lead to no amendment, nor will it lead to any legislation by this House, and it ought not to receive the attention that would seem to be given to it by raising a select committee. The most proper disposition of this memorial would be such as was given to it at the last session—by laying it on the table.

But, sir, if it is to have a reference to a committee, that portion of it which relates to the amendment of the constitution should be referred to the select committee some time since appointed, and to which the various propositions in relation to the amendment of the constitution have already been referred. It would be appropriate for that committee to consider this, or other amendments that may be proposed. Is this House going to set the precedent of indulging every set of petitioners, be their numbers great or small, with a select committee to consider their projects? If this be established as the rule and practice of this House, these memorials will multiply on our hands much, with various schemes of amendment, and we shall have as many projected amendments, and as many select committees, as there are articles in the constitution. Let us set no such precedent; but, if the House will give it a reference, let it be made to a committee already selected, having charge of the subject.

But another part of this memorial relates to the acts and proceedings of a State bank in Pennsylvania. It is complained that the Pennsylvania United States Bank, in its business transactions, uses, to a certain extent, some of the bank notes of the late United States Bank. Whether it does or does not, whether it is right or wrong in this, and whether it be authorized or prohibited, are questions and matters with which this House has nothing to do; they belong to the people of Pennsylvania. It is a State institution, created by State authority, and amenable to our State Judiciary and State Legislature for the abuses of its powers, if they be abused.

Our State tribunals are fully competent to take care of our State institutions and protect our citizens, without the interference of this House, in a matter of which it has no cognizance or jurisdiction; and if it does interfere, it is by encroaching on State rights, and usurping power and authority which does not belong to it.

By whom is it that this House is asked to inquire into a subject belonging to the courts and Legislature of Pennsylvania? It is on the memorial of twenty-eight petitioners from Pennsylvania, out of a population of one million and a half; a memorial not now emanating from the people, complaining of any existing or recent grievance or abuse, but raised up from the old files of the House, where it was supposed to be buried. Is this all that is required to induce the House to take Pennsylvania under its charge, and assume to do what belongs to the people of Pennsylvania and her State authorities? Against any such interference or assumption of power, as one of the representatives of Pennsylvania, I protest.

But, sir, we are told by the honorable member from New York, [Mr. MANN,] in more than a whisper, that there is a special reason and propriety in indulging my colleague with a select committee, as he understood that this State bank was about to locate a branch in the district of my colleague; and as my honorable colleague [Mr. GALBRAITH] was sitting near the member from New York, he may take this as his suggestion. It was further alleged, as a reason for the interference of the House to make the inquiry, that the proposed branch of the State bank might, it was apprehended, corrupt the people of that district.

The location of a branch of this State bank in that district is a question of policy, expediency, and power, for the consideration of the people and Legislature of Pennsylvania. It belongs exclusively to them and the bank, and they can and will settle the question for themselves. This House has no jurisdiction or power over it.

If the location of the branch in the district of my colleague is a grievance, tending to corrupt the people, and they are opposed to it, how is it, out of a population of fifty thousand and more in that district, it should be left to these twenty-eight petitioners to take care of the interests of the people of that district, and to manifest their opposition?

Such considerations, thus supported, ought not to influence this House in assuming to legislate on a subject out of their power and jurisdiction, and within the power and cognizance alone of State authority.

It cannot, I think, be seriously expected that there will be any legislation by this House on this memorial; and as the whole subject is one calculated to produce discussion, create excitement, rouse party feelings, and consume time, without leading to any practical legislation, I move to lay the memorial, &c. on the table.

Mr. VANDERPOEL said he was surprised that so much sensibility had been discovered by gentlemen on account of the introduction of the petition now under consideration. It stated no new, no unknown grievance; it proposed no very strange or unreasonable remedy. It proceeded on the assumption that gold and silver was the legal and constitutional currency of this country; and that in the place of gold and silver the country was now inundated with a miserable paper currency, continually expanding and expanding until we were threatened with explosion, most terrible and overwhelming.

H. or R.]

And was there not much force in the views which the petitioners took? Was it not true that the expansion of the paper system had, within the last three years, been most alarming and unprecedented? Was it not true that by this means a false and pernicious value had been given to every thing, so that the poor man's dollar now would not buy more than fifty cents would secure for him four years ago? From the report of the Secretary of the Treasury the House would see that since the first day of January, 1834, the paper money of the country had increased from seventy-six millions to more than one hundred and twenty millions of dollars, while within the last two years one hundred and six new banks had been created, with capitals amounting to more than sixty millions of dollars, and about thirteen millions of dollars had been added to the capitals of old banks. Many millions of banking capital have been added since the report of the Secretary was made; and yet was it not true that "the appetite of bank applicants seemed to increase with what it fed on?" Was there any prospect of satiating or gorging them? Did not this state of things give cause for alarm to the calm sober thinker and the patriot? He was not prepared to say that he was disposed altogether, or all at once, to dispense with, or put down, the paper system. Such a scheme, with the hope of carrying it immediately into execution, would, perhaps, be as utopian as the rapid and continuing expansion of your paper system was alarming. It was necessary to deal with this subject with the spirit of practical statesmen, not with the dogmatical temper of stiff and stern theorists, who, after brooding over their favorite theory for years, until it becomes a sort of monomania, would hazard the most sudden and convulsing remedies, to carry it into practical execution. It was not always wise to lose at once all respect for things that are, in order to bring about things that ought to be. Gradual alternatives were oftentimes better than violent remedies, which racked the system to death. He had within the last three years (he spoke with much deference) heard the constitutional currency of the country too often stigmatized with the dignified appellation of "gold humbug." Yet it had often occurred to him that the feeling which dictated such opprobrious ebullitions found some extenuation in the impracticable schemes which some of us entertained; in the belief that we could, and should, with one bold dash, rid the country of your one hundred and twenty or thirty millions of paper currency, and supply its place with a sufficiency of gold and silver for the various ramifications of the business of this vast and enterprising country. Yes, while there seemed to be those who believed that a paper currency, however expanded, was harmless, there were others who seemed to suppose that we could at once repudiate the whole paper system, and usher in a "golden age," without producing a revulsion too serious to contemplate. It behoved us, if we were indeed intent upon doing something that was salutary, to avoid such extremes. The crisis called for a remedy from some quarter against a too expanded and continually expanding paper currency; and if here was the place where the cure was to originate, a responsibility had indeed devolved upon the wise doctors here assembled, that should put in requisition all their skill and all their wisdom.

He had remarked that the petition represented to us an evil, as to the existence of which all gentlemen concurred, viz: the alarming multiplication of banks by the States, and the danger which your expanded and expanding paper system portended; but while all concurred in the existence of the evil, there was much diversity of opinion in regard to the remedy. Many gentlemen here supposed that a natural and an excellent remedy was already within our constitutional reach—that a national bank was the best regulator of the currency, the grand panacea by which the whole feverish monetary system was at once to be restored to stability and health. There was another class of gentlemen who believe that the power to create this alleged remedy was not conferred on us by the constitution; and if it had been delegated to us, it was, at best, one of those desperate remedies that was worse than the disease. Another class of gentlemen believed that the remedy was to be found in a section of the federal constitution, which prohibits the States "from coining money, emitting bills of credit, or making any thing but gold and silver a lawful tender." The petitioners seemed to assume this position, and evidently desired a declaratory amendment of the constitution, indicating unequivocally that this section of the constitution includes a prohibition against the States to make or emit paper money through the medium of incorporated banks. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LINCOLN] had denounced this position as preposterous. It was not necessary, for the purpose of the subject immediately under discussion, that he (Mr. V.) should contend that the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts was wrong in the view which he took of this point, and that the petitioners were "right;" but after their sense of the true meaning of the constitution had been so emphatically denounced, if not ridiculed, by the honorable gentleman, it was at least due to the petitioners to say that they had very high authority for the construction which they seemed to give that clause of the constitution which prohibits the States from emitting bills of credit, or from making any thing but gold and silver a lawful tender—an authority which the gentleman from Massachusetts himself would be disposed to respect. Mr. Madison, in the forty-fourth number of the Federalist, in commenting upon that section of the constitution which prohibits the States from coining money, emitting bills of credit, or making any thing but gold and silver a lawful tender, remarks as follows:

"The extension of the prohibition to bills of credit must give pleasure to every citizen, in proportion to his love of justice and his knowledge of the true springs of public prosperity. The loss which America has sustained since the peace, from the pestilential effects of paper money on the necessary confidence between man and man, on the necessary confidence in the public councils, on the industry and morals of the people, and on the character of republican government, constitutes an enormous debt against the States chargeable with this unadvised measure, which must long remain unsatisfied; or rather, an accumulation of guilt which can be expiated no otherwise than by a voluntary sacrifice on the altar of justice of the power which has been the instrument of it. In addition to these persuasive considerations, it may be observed that the same reasons which show the necessity of denying to the States the power of regulating coin prove with equal force that they ought not to be at liberty to substitute a paper medium in the place of coin. Had every State a right to regulate the value of its coin, there might be as many different currencies as States, and thus the intercourse between them would be impeded; retrospective alterations in its value might be made, and thus the citizens of other States be injured, and animosities be kindled among the States themselves. The subjects of foreign Powers might suffer from the same course, and hence the Union be discredited and embroiled by the indiscretion of a single member. No one of these mischiefs is less incident to a power in the States to emit paper money than to coin gold and silver. The power to make any thing but gold and silver a tender in payment of debts, is withdrawn from the States on the same principle with that of issuing a paper currency."

Sir, (said Mr. V.,) here is a contemporaneous exposition of one section of the constitution, from the pen of one who had well been denominated "the author and finisher of the constitution." This was enough, at all events, to have saved the petitioners from the denunciations which their view of the sense and meaning of one clause of the constitution had here encountered; and should, perhaps, have commanded a little more respect for the remedy they propose for the evils upon which they dwell. He was free to say, that if this clause of the constitution, prohibiting the States from issuing bills of credit, included a prohibition on the authority of the States to make paper money, through the medium of incorporated banks, it might at this day, for any such purpose, be regarded as a dead letter. The States had, for more than forty years, exercised the power of incorporating banks with power to issue notes; and if the original exercise of this power was founded in usurpation and error, (which he would not here fully discuss,) it was, at all events, an error so old and so general as to have acquired the authority of right and law, according to one of the maxims of the common law, "Communis error facit jus;" and it would be expecting if not asking too much to suppose that, after the long exercise of this power by the States, and the general acquiescence of the people therein, the judicial tribunals of the country would now give a practical interpretation to the above clause of the constitution, in accordance with the view of Mr. Madison. If it were right and proper, then, that there should be some regulating means by which this power of the States could be restricted within reasonable limits, was not the prayer of the petitioners a reasonable one, proposing a feasible object? and did not their petition deserve from us most respectful, if not most serious, consideration? Mr. V. said he would repeat his surprise at the fact that some gentlemen had discussed this petition as if it were so monstrous as not to be entitled even to common courtesy at our hands; but his surprise was somewhat diminished when he reflected that this petition proposed a means of regulating the currency other than that which was to be found in the fiat of a board of bank directors convened in Philadelphia.

Having deemed it pertinent to say what he had said, as to the nature, scope, and object, of the petition, he would add a word as to the disposition that should be made of it. It had been remarked by one gentleman, that it ought to be referred to one of the standing committees of this House, and particularly to that committee which was appointed upon that portion of the President's message that related to amendments to the constitution. It surely did not fairly come within the jurisdiction of that committee, because that was a select committee appointed to take cognizance of a particular subject; an amendment of the constitution, so far as it regards the election of President and Vice President. [Here Mr. LINCOLN interrupted Mr. V., and said that he thought the resolution appointing that select committee was broad enough to include all amendments to the constitution that might be proposed, and called for the reading of the resolution.] Mr. V. said that the resolution was obviously retrospective, not prospective; it related merely to propositions pending before the House at the time of its passage, and could not be construed to comprehend future propositions, relating to subjects other than the election of President and Vice President; and, while he was up, he would take occasion to say a word about this select committee, annually and for many years past appointed to consider the proposed amendments to the constitution; and in what he was about to say he certainly could mean no personal disrespect to that committee, for it had been his good or ill fortune last year, and now again, to be a humble member of it, and to be associated with pure and most enlightened gentlemen. It might, nevertheless, be called a "humbug committee," year after year deliberating over the crude propositions of gentlemen to amend the constitution; year after year reporting to the House some sage plan, but never yet, to his knowledge, (no doubt from the nature of the subject,) coming to any conclusion that obtained the sanction of this House; whatever the cause, it seemed to be a body that produced no available fruit.

Another gentleman had remarked that this subject properly belonged to the Committee of Ways and Means. For his part, he could not see the remotest connexion between a proposition to amend the constitution in a particular of this description, and the duty of raising ways and means for the support of the Government; nor could he imagine any good reason for referring the petition to the Judiciary Committee, for it embraced an object that rose far above the ordinary range of the duties of your Committee on the Judiciary. He was for referring it to a select committee, who, appreciating its importance, would feel all becoming responsibility, and give us the result of calm, patient, and enlightened deliberation. He had felt it due to the petitioners, and to the subject of their petition, to submit these remarks, and, more especially, since, from the tenor of the remarks of some gentlemen, they seemed to consider the presentation of this petition to us very extraordinary, if not insolent.

Mr. EVERETT said he had voted against laying the petition on the table, and should vote for its reference to a select committee; and he desired, in a few words, to give the reason for this course. The question derived all its importance from the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. GALBRAITH.] The petition, in itself, was deserving of but little consideration; was got up during the last session, under particular circumstances, and for a particular object, not now requiring the action of the House; nor was there any evidence that the petitioners desired its consideration; but it had been adopted by the gentleman from Pennsylvania as the occasion of his motion for a special committee. It was therefore entitled to the same consideration as a resolution asking for an inquiry would be. He did not consider this motion as having been made merely on the responsibility of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, but as having been made on consultation, in concert with the friends of the present, or, rather, coming administration. For a long time the public had been entertained with general and vague propositions in relation to the currency. For one, he was desirous that the administration should have an opportunity, and one that could not be evaded, of laying before the country its specific view and plans on this subject. He hoped a committee entirely favorable to its views should be raised, that its distinct plans might be laid before the country. If there was any settled plan, he wished to know it. He wished for something more than non-committal. If it was intended to make war on the power of the States to incorporate banks, the sooner it was known the better. If the plan of a specie currency was to be adopted, he wished to be informed how it was to be effected; he wished to see some practical plan proposed; he wished to give the administration an opportunity to show their head. The gentleman from New York [Mr. VANDERPOEL] had assigned, unintentionally, probably, a reason why it should be referred to the committee raised on amendments to the constitution. He had styled that committee a humbug committee, and it would seem to follow that this subject might, with great propriety, be referred to that committee; but he has assigned a sufficient reason why it should not be referred to that committee. He said, and I agree with him, that that committee was not appointed with a view to this particular subject. Let a committee, then, be appointed with a view to this subject—a committee that will fully expose the views of the administration; let us have their definite plans, something responsible. It is of immense importance, not only to the commercial interest but to the country at large, that the questions in relation to the currency should be settled.

Mr. EVERETT having concluded his remarks,

Mr. HANNEGAN called for the previous question; which the House seconded: Yeas 85, nays 75.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, called for the yeas and nays on the question of taking the main question; which were ordered, and were as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Barton, Beale, Black, Bockee, Boon, Borden, Bouldin, Bovee, Boyd, Brown, Bunch, Cambreleng, Carr, Casey, Chaney, Chapin, Cleveland, Coles, Connor, Craig, Cramer, Davis, Doubleday, Dunlap, Efner, Fairfield, Fowler, French, Fry, Fuller, Galbraith, James Garland, Gillet, Glascock, Haley, Joseph Hall, Hamer, Hannegan, Albert G. Harrison, Henderson, Holsey, Holt, Hopkins, Howard, Hubley, Huntington, Huntsman, Ingham, Jarvis, Joseph Johnson, Richard M. Johnson, Cave Johnson, Benjamin Jones, Kennon, Kilgore, Klingensmith, Lane, Laporte, Joshua Lee, Thomas Lee, Leonard, Logan, Loyall, Lucas, Abijah Mann, Job Mann, Martin, William Mason, Moses Mason, McCarty, McKim, McLene, Miller, Montgomery, Moore, Morgan, Muhlenberg, Owens, Page, Parker, Parks, Patterson, Franklin Pierce, Dutee J. Pearce, Phelps, John Reynolds, Joseph Reynolds, Ripley, Schenck, Seymour, Shields, Shinn, Sickles, Smith, Speight, Taylor, Thomas, John Thomson, Turner, Turill, Vanderpool, Wagener, Wardwell, Webster, Weeks, Thomas T. Whittlesey, Yell—108.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Heman Allen, Ash, Ashley, Bailey, Bell, Bond, Briggs, William B. Calhoun, Campbell, Carter, George Chambers, John Chambers, Chetwood, Childs, Nathaniel H. Claiborne, Clark, Corwin, Crane, Cushing, Darlington, Dawson, Deberry, Denny, Elmore, Evans, Everett, Forester, Graham, Granger, Graves, Grayson, Griffin, Harlan, Harper, Samuel S. Harrison, Hazeltine, Hiester, Hoar, Howell, Janes, Jenifer, Henry Johnson, Lawler, Lawrence, Lay, Luke Lea, Lewis, Lincoln, Samson Mason, Maury, McComas, McKay, McKennan, Mercer, Pearson, Pettigrew, Peyton, Phillips, Pickens, Pinckney, Potts, Reed, Rencher, Richardson, Robertson, Rogers, Russell, Augustine H. Shepperd, Slade, Sloane, Spangler, Standefer, Steele, Storer, Taliaferro, Waddy Thompson, Underwood, Vinton, Washington, White, Elisha Whittlesey, Lewis Williams, Young—84.

So the House determined that the main question be now put, being the reference to the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. EVERETT asked that the question might be taken first on that portion of the memorial which related to the proposed amendment to the constitution; and, secondly, on that portion relative to the issue by the Bank of Pennsylvania of the old notes of the United States Bank; and the division was ordered.

And the main question, being on the commitment of the first portion of the memorial to the Committee of Ways and Means, was taken, and decided in the negative.

And the second portion of the main question, being on the commitment of the second part of the memorial to the Committee of Ways and Means, was then taken, and decided in the negative.

So the House refused to commit the memorial to the Committee of Ways and Means.

The question then recurred on committing the first portion of the memorial to a select committee, as moved by Mr. GALBRAITH; which motion prevailed.

And the question was then taken on committing the second portion of the memorial to the said select committee; and was decided in the affirmative.

So the memorial was referred to a select committee, to consist of nine members.

[The committee consists of the following gentlemen: MESSRS. GALBRAITH, of Pennsylvania; SPEIGHT, of North Carolina; EVERETT, of Vermont; MASON, of Maine; LINCOLN, of Massachusetts; MANN, of New York; JENIFER, of Maryland; HOLSEY, of Georgia; and CRAIG, of Virginia.]

After transacting some other business,

FRIDAY, DECEMBER 30.

THE PUBLIC LANDS.

When the usual business of the morning had been gone through with,

Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, moved to suspend the rules to enable him to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Public Lands inquire into the expediency of prohibiting by law the purchase of lands at auction, with a view to forfeit them, and afterwards to obtain them at Government price of one dollar and twenty-five cents per acre.

Mr. W. called for the yeas and nays on the motion to suspend the rules for this purpose, which were ordered; and, being taken, were: Yeas 154, nays 38. So the House suspended the rules.

Mr. LANE moved to amend the resolution by striking out the words "Committee on Public Lands," and inserting the words "a select committee;" and also by adding at the end of the resolution the following words: "and also to inquire into the expediency of confining all sales of the public lands to actual settlers."

Mr. L. said that, in offering the amendment, he had been actuated by a desire to bring this proposition directly before the House. No question had ever arisen which was of greater importance to the various interests of the country. It was important as regarded the manufacturing interest; it was important with reference to the surplus revenue; it was important in its reference to the currency and to mercantile transactions; and it was important as regarded the settlement of the whole Western country. Any gentleman who had ever attended the sales of the public lands at auction must see the necessity of putting a stop to the practice which had prevailed for a few years. Mr. L. here alluded to the practice of the agents of speculating companies, who attended these sales, bidding a little higher than the laboring man who had traversed the wilderness and settled down on these lands could afford, and thus depriving him of his purchase. By this process, the Government made only a few cents more, and the hard earnings of the laboring man were thus rendered useless to him. He had to buy lands at second entry, whilst the speculator, who had purchased the numbers which the actual settler intended to purchase, was residing in a distant part of the country. By adopting the course proposed by the amendment, Mr. L. said the proceeds of the sales of the public lands might be brought back to three millions per annum, being the amount sold in former years. He had great confidence in the Committee on Public Lands. This subject had received the notice of the President in his last annual message, and had been referred to that committee; but he (Mr. L.) had understood that they were not able to agree on any definite proposition. For this reason, and in order that the final action of the House might be had during the present session, he had moved the change of reference from the Committee on Public Lands to a select committee.

Mr. BOON said he was not going to make a speech, but he rose to express his astonishment at the proposition of the gentleman from Indiana. He considered the amendment as a direct and unqualified reflection on the Committee on Public Lands; and he repelled the reflection with indignation. The question of confining the sales of the public lands to actual settlers was made the subject of a part of the annual message of the President, which part had been referred to the Committee on Public Lands. They had this very proposition under consideration; but whether they would be able to agree on a bill, he did not know. He was glad, however, that the proposition had been enlarged by the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. WILLIAMS.] If subject-matters of investigation properly belonging to the standing committees of the House were thus to be wrested out of their hands, he hoped the Committee on Public Lands would be stricken from the list altogether.

Mr. LANE assured the gentleman from Indiana, and also the chairman of the Committee on Public Lands, that he intended no reflection by his motion. He had great confidence in the integrity and talent of that committee; but he had understood, from a source not likely to be mistaken, that there was no probability of that committee agreeing on any final proposition. If the chairman of the committee would assure him that the committee would bring the subject forward in some definite shape, in time to be acted on by the House, he (Mr. L.) would withdraw his amendment.

Mr. DUNLAP opposed the adoption of the amendment, and expressed his astonishment that the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. LANE] should move the reference to a select committee, inasmuch as he (Mr. L.) had himself offered a resolution by which this very subject had been referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. LANE said he had just understood that a bill would be agreed upon by the committee of the Senate, embracing entirely his views. He therefore withdrew his amendment.

And, thereupon, the original resolution of Mr. WILLIAMS was adopted.

Mr. VANDERPOEL moved a suspension of the rule, to enable him to offer a resolution that when the House adjourn, it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

The motion was rejected: Ayes, 95, noes 65—not two thirds. So the House refused to suspend the rule.

Mr. HARLAN moved to suspend the rule, to enable him to submit a resolution that when the House adjourn to-morrow, it adjourn to meet on Tuesday next; which motion prevailed: Ayes 127, noes 36.

And the question on the adoption of the resolution was then taken, and decided in the affirmative. So the motion to adjourn over from to-morrow to Tuesday was agreed to.

COLONEL JOHN WINSTON.

On motion of Mr. WHITTLESEY, of Ohio, the House then resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, and resumed the consideration of bills upon which that committee had obtained leave to sit again, (Mr. HAYNES in the chair.)

The first bill before the committee was a bill for the relief of the representatives of Colonel John Winston, an officer in the revolutionary war. A discussion took place on the question of allowing interest upon as well as the principal of this claim.

Mr. MUHLENBERG said: I had hoped, Mr. Chairman, that after the decision made at the last session of Congress, in the case of Nancy Haggard, we should have had no more trouble with bills of the nature of the one now before you, but am disappointed. It was then decided, after argument, in the Committee of the Whole, and the decision was confirmed by an overwhelming majority in the House, that interest should be paid upon claims of this description. The question is, however, again brought up, and I trust it will now be decided promptly and finally.

The great mass of revolutionary claims may be embraced in two classes: commutation cases and seven years' half pay cases. With the permission of the committee, I will say a word or two in explanation of each of these classes, and then submit a few remarks upon the propriety of paying them with interest, and make an attempt to show that the practice of the Government and the House, that justice, equity, and the common good, imperiously demand their settlement in that way.

Commutation cases are founded upon two separate resolves or laws of the revolutionary Congress. The first was passed October 21, 1780, and gives half pay for life to all such officers of the continental line of the army who should by the reorganization of the army, which was then ordered, be found supernumerary, and be reduced; and also to all who should continue in the service, in that line, to the end of the war. The second resolve was passed on the 22d of March, 1783, and commutes this half pay for life, by allowing to all who were entitled to it, in lieu thereof, five years' full pay.

With a knowledge of these resolutions of the revolutionary Congress, there can be little or no difficulty in determining who is entitled to commutation. If it be clearly established, by documentary or other sufficient evidence, that an officer belonged to the continental line proper; that he served to the entire close of the war, in November, 1783; or that he became a reduced officer after October, 1780, by the reorganization of the army ordered at that time, his claim to commutation pay must be considered as valid. Several other reductions of the army were ordered and made subsequent to that of October, 1780, and prior to the close of the war; and the officers thereby reduced also became entitled to half pay for life, and the commutation thereof by five years' full pay. I trust the Committee on Revolutionary Claims, to which these cases are referred, report bills in favor of none but such as are strictly entitled to relief. They consider themselves as much bound to protect the interest of the Government as that of the claimants, and can never forget that, in doing justice to one, they must not be unjust to another. They are quite willing that their reports, in each individual case, shall be strictly scrutinized, well assured that they will bear the severest test.

The next class of cases are seven years' half pay claims. These are founded upon the resolve of August 24, 1780, which extends the resolution of May 15, 1778, granting half pay for seven years to military officers commissioned by Congress serving to the end of the war, "to the widows of those officers who have died or shall hereafter die in the service, to commence from the time of such officer's death, and continue for the term of seven years; or if there be no widow, or in case of her death or intermarriage, the said half pay be given to the orphan children of the officer dying as aforesaid, if he shall have left any."

Here, again, it is only necessary to establish that an officer belonged to the continental line; was a military officer, commissioned by Congress; that he died in the service; that he left a widow or orphan children, to give a well-founded claim to the reward promised solemnly by the Government; going in the first place to the widow, and then, in case of death or intermarriage, to the children and their issue, and none else.

It being, then, ascertained clearly that an officer of the continental line of the army of the Revolution served to the entire close of the war, or that he was reduced, and became a retiring officer under and after the resolves of October, 1780; or that he died in the service prior or subsequent to the resolutions of May, 1778, or August, 1780, leaving a widow or orphan children—these circumstances being established, there can be no doubt that he or his heirs, as the case may be, become entitled to that remuneration, to the payment of which the faith of the Government was pledged.

The question remains, are these claims to be paid with interest or not? To determine this question, it appears to me only necessary to refer to the original mode of payment; to the practice of the Government before and during the suspension of the limitation acts; to the opinion of the Attorney General at a time when there was no excitement on the subject; to the invariable practice of this House, and to the justice and expediency of the thing itself.

How were these claims originally satisfied? Congress was well aware, at the time the promise of payment was made, that it had no funds to satisfy them; that payment could not be made in money that was specie; and therefore, in promising five years' full pay in lieu of half pay for life, by its resolution of March 22, 1783, made this reservation: "in money, or securities on interest at six per cent. per annum, as Congress shall find most convenient." No one is so ignorant as not to know that money was not paid; that Congress adopted the alternative; that commutation certificates, as they were called, were issued to the applicants for the five years' full pay, bearing an interest of six per cent. per annum.

This was the practice of the Government at the close of the war, and before the passage of the limitation acts. These were, however, several times suspended for short periods, and then these claims were again paid, in the same manner, with interest from the termination of the service. I refer you to a communication on the subject, from the Secretary of the Treasury, laid upon our tables during the last session of Congress. It is Document 224. What are we told in this communication? "all certificates of public debt, issued by the Register of the Treasury, by the commissioner of army accounts, and by the commissioners for settling the accounts of individuals in the several States; and in the quartermaster's, Commissary's, marine, and clothing departments, for services rendered or supplies furnished during the war of the Revolution, or in fulfillment of promises contained in any ordinance or resolution of the old Congress, were on interest at six per cent. per annum from the termination of the service, or from the time the supplies were furnished." Can any thing be more clear and conclusive in regard to the practice of the Government? None other could be adopted, because it was directed by an ordinance of Congress adopted soon after the close of the war, (June 3, 1784,) in these words: "Resolved, That an interest of six per cent. per annum shall be allowed to all creditors of the United States, for supplies furnished or services done, from the time that the payment became due."

As a further proof that these claims were adjusted by the Government with an allowance of interest, I will also refer you to an opinion given by the Attorney General (R. Rush) in 1816, when there was little or no excitement on the subject, and which clearly shows that, in his view of things, interest ought to be paid in every case, even where there were special acts of relief, without an express proviso for its payment. The opinion I allude to is contained in Document No. 224 of the last session. It is in these words: "The following case, stated by the Auditor, is submitted by the Secretary of the Treasury to the Attorney General, for his opinion:

"Alexander Hamilton was a lieutenant colonel in the army of the revolutionary war, but was understood to have retired from service towards the close of the year

1781; and in the month of November, 1782, took his seat in Congress, as a member from the State of New York.

"Does the act for the relief of Elizabeth Hamilton, widow of Alexander Hamilton, passed on the 29th of April, 1816, place her on an equal footing with the officers entitled to commutation under the resolution of Congress of March, 1783? Or, in other words, does the spirit and true meaning of the said act require that interest be allowed on the five years' full pay therein granted?

"I think it does. I am given to understand that it has not been the practice of the accounting officers of the Treasury Department to allow interest upon an account directed to be settled or paid by an act of Congress, unless there be in the act itself special words to that effect. This rule, taken as a general one, it is not my part to controvert, nor is it supposed that the above opinion will imply any contradiction.

"I ground it on the peculiar words of the act of April 29, 1816, which, taken in connexion with the resolution of March 22, 1783, appears to me, on full consideration, to enforce the construction that it was the intention of Congress not merely to make an independent grant to Elizabeth Hamilton, but to place her upon a footing of equal advantage, in all respects, with the officers entitled to commutation under that resolution. The consequence will be that, as was the case with the officers themselves, (none of whom, it is believed, received the amount in money,) she too will be entitled to interest at six per cent., the rate specified in the resolution.—Richard Rush, A. G."

The Attorney General, Mr. Chairman, was correct; and those who informed him that it was not "the practice of the accounting officers of the Treasury Department to allow interest upon an account directed to be settled or paid by an act of Congress, unless there be, in the act itself, special words to that effect," were in error, as far at least as regards seven years' half pay and commutation cases. I will turn to a single act in confirmation of the assertion; it is the act of March 27, 1792, entitled "An act for the relief of certain widows, orphans, invalids, and other persons." The first section directs that the Comptroller of the Treasury "adjust the claims of the widows and orphans, respectively, as the case may be, of eight officers named, all of whom were killed or died in the service of the United States, for the seven years' half pay stipulated by the resolve of Congress of the 24th day of August, 1786, and that the Register of the Treasury do issue his certificates accordingly." The fourth section requires the Comptroller to "adjust the accounts of Joseph Pannel, a lieutenant colonel in the service of the United States, as a deranged officer, upon the principles of the act of the late Congress of October, 1780, and allow him the usual commutation of the half pay for life of a lieutenant colonel;" also, to "adjust the account of Thomas McIntire, a captain in the service of the United States during the late war, and to allow him the usual commutation of the half pay for life of a captain; and that the said Register grant certificates for the amount accordingly." Here are seven years' half pay cases; the commutation case of an officer deranged, by the reorganization of the army under the resolves of October, 1780; and the commutation case of an officer serving to the close of the war, provided for. There is no where in the act a clause directing interest to be paid. There are no "special words to that effect in the act itself;" and yet I have before me a letter from the Register of the Treasury, stating that they were all paid with six per cent. interest—the seven years' half pay as well as the commutation cases. It is a fact which cannot be denied, and the Register of the Treasury will satisfy any one upon this head, that the claims which were presented under the acts of March 23 and 27, 1792, and February 12, 1793, suspending the statutes of limitation as to the claims of widows and orphans, and claims of personal services of officers, &c. were all paid, when admitted at the Treasury, with interest.

Thus much for the practice of the Government before and during the suspension of the limitation acts; and what has been the practice of this House since difficulties were raised at the departments. I will at this time barely reassert what I have shown at large upon a former occasion: that for the last six or eight years it has been the invariable practice, of this House at least, to grant interest on these claims; and that, constituted as the House is, appears to me a strong proof that its justice and equity are deeply felt. I recollect a large number of cases in the twenty-second Congress, and some in the twenty-third, which I will not again name, lest I should exhaust the patience of the committee. To my knowledge, (and I have some little experience, having been here for eight years,) no bill ever passed this House originally without having the interest clause attached to it. In some few instances, I admit, it was overlooked; but bills were afterwards passed providing specially for the interest, where the principal had been allowed by a former act. Such was the case in relation to Price, Slaughter, and Colonel Harrison's heirs. In the case of the heirs of Brownlee, and also of Wilson, claims for seven years' half pay, the bills had been reported without interest; they were amended by adding the interest, and they passed, as amended, in February, 1833. I cannot be mistaken, having in the one case at least moved the amendment myself. Shall we depart from the precedent now? What would be the consequence? Would we, as we should, be dealing out the same measure of justice to all in a like situation? Certainly not. One claimant would receive a thousand dollars, and another, in all respects similarly situated, would not receive more than half that amount. Would not this justly give rise to complaints? Would it not be a reflection upon the judgment and justice of the House? It is true the other branch of Congress has, in the two last sessions, returned our bills with the interest clause stricken out, and they were at the close of those sessions passed in that shape here. It was, however, understood to be without prejudice to the rights of the parties. Their wants being pressing, they thought "half a loaf better than none," and agreed to leave the allowance of interest to the future decision of the House. Here it must be decided, and I trust the principle established by the precedent will not be abandoned.

The only plausible reason I have yet heard for a refusal of interest is the delay which has so often occurred in presenting the claim. In most cases, this delay is, however, easily accounted for. We all know that military men naturally and almost necessarily acquire careless habits in regard to their money affairs: I mean military men actively employed, as were those of the revolutionary war. This was peculiarly and notoriously the case with the chivalry of the army, the gallant Southern officers; and from the South come nearly all these claims.

Besides, there was not much to be gained by applying for commutation certificates prior to the time when the limitation acts took effect. When received, they were worth scarcely more than sixpence in the dollar; never more, I believe, than two and sixpence in the pound, and were looked upon as no better than rags. The poor soldier too often disposed of his certificate for the bounty of eighty dollars, to which he was entitled at the close of the war, for the merest trifle, in which he rejoiced for a single hour; and more still, your Government seemed anxious to defraud them even out of these miserable rags. As early as March, 1785, (scarcely eighteen months after the close of the war,) an act was passed, barring all such claims as should not be presented within twelve months after that date. In July, 1787, a further period of eight months was allowed. How could claims of this description, scattered throughout the whole of an extensive and new country, in many instances in the hands of widows and minor children, who had none to care for them, be expected to be presented in such a time? Who would calculate upon it, particularly when they were considered as of little or no value?

These claims became valuable only after the funding act of August, 1790. After this there was, strictly speaking, but one other suspension of the statutes of limitation, in the year 1792, and that for but a short period. After this, (to the disgrace of the Government it must be said,) in nine cases out of ten, these claims were refused even a consideration, completely thrown out, by pleading the limitation acts. I have had occasion to look over many of the old reports made after that period, and find such to have been almost invariably the case. Yes, sir, when the broken-down veteran, who had destroyed his health and his fortune for his country's good; when his destitute widow, when his hapless orphans, knocked at your doors, and asked for the redemption of your solemn pledges, for the payment of their just dues, you threw them back their petitions, endorsed "barred by the statute of limitation." You refuse a reasonable time for the presentment of claims; and when they are brought, you tell the claimant you cannot even consider it, not because it is not just, but because you did not come in time. Call you this justice? Is this equitable? Is this right?

It is true the poverty of the Government was and may be pleaded in excuse. But can it be pleaded at this time? Are you not burdened with an enormous surplus of revenue—a surplus so great that you scarcely know how to dispose of it, and about which you are continually expressing your fears that it will corrupt your people, degrade your States, and undermine the very foundation of your free institutions? Will you not now, then, do justice to those pure and patriotic men who perilled their lives, their fortunes, and their sacred honor, for your good? Will you still remain deaf to the call of the impoverished descendants of those to whose privations, toil, and blood, you are indebted for all the glorious privileges and all the unequalled prosperity you now enjoy? God Almighty's sun will never shine at any period, or in any land, upon another such a generation as were our fathers of the Revolution, both in the cabinet and field. They have done all for us with sacrifices unequalled any where; and shall we do nothing for them, and for those who must have been dear to them as self, and whose good was jeopardized for the common weal?

Yes, sir, look at that splendid drapery around your chair; behold that inimitable work of the artist's chisel before you, examine these massive and noble pillars, those splendid paintings, these convenient desks, the elegant carpeting under your feet; take a view of this whole splendid Capitol, the noble grounds with which it is surrounded, the superior flagging laid in every direction, that you may not moisten your delicate feet; think of all the glorious privileges, civil and religious, which you enjoy; of the unexampled prosperity which crowns every portion of your land, and every commercial, manufacturing, and agricultural pursuit of its citizens; and then tell me to whom you owe all this. Has it not been purchased by the perils and sacrifices, by the privations and blood, of our glorious fathers of the Revolution? Shall those who bore the heat and burden of the day, and their immediate descendants, not have justice, at least, at your hands? Shall the solemn pledges made them not be redeemed? Shall they be defeated by pleading limitation acts? I trust not.

I do not wish, Mr. Chairman, to address myself to the feelings of gentlemen; I do not wish to enlist their passions, or I might say more. I wish a verdict in favor of the officers of the Revolution and their descendants from their sound sense and deliberate judgment only. They ask no favors. They ask for justice, and justice alone. Satisfy them thus far, and let not the world say: republics are always ungrateful and always unjust. The very nature of the case demands this, and the common good. Or would it be just to refuse a claim, founded upon a solemn pledge of the Government, purchased in most cases by the life and blood of a citizen, yielded in the service of the country, yielded to attain the glorious independence, the high privileges, the distinguished blessings, we now enjoy? Would it be just, would it be equitable, would it be creditable, to refuse redeeming a pledge given under circumstances like these? Or do we value a little contemptible pelf more than the precious blood of patriotic citizens?

But, sir, not only justice and equity demand a settlement of these claims, upon the most liberal principles, with interest, I mean, but also the common good. We are now enjoying the blessings of peace, but we cannot expect to enjoy them always. War will again come, be it sooner or later. If you refuse to redeem the pledges you gave your soldiers, the pledge, particularly, to take care of their widows and orphans in case they should fall fighting your battles, how can you expect men to enter your service hereafter?

The best soldiers, the bravest defenders of their country, are undoubtedly those who are most attached to their homesteads, to their wives and their children. If you rob them of the hope that their wives and little ones are to be provided for, if you lead them to believe that your solemn pledges in this respect are not to be redeemed, how dare you expect them cheerfully to lead the forlorn hope, manfully to mount the breach, gallantly to storm the battery, in the very face of death and destruction?

I have but one more word to say. It is not the bill itself now before you, but the principle involved in it, which is important; it is because it must decide the fate of many others, that it is contested. Against this particular bill there seems to be but slight objections. If I distinctly heard the gentleman from Vermont, [Mr. ALLEN,] he thought the evidence not of the strongest character. Sir, you have the certificate of officers of the army as to the necessary service of officers engaged in the same contest; you have the deposition of a most worthy citizen, living at the period; you have the records of the State of Virginia, that he received land bounty for services from 1776 to February 13, 1781; you have his pay certificate from the same State, for services from 1776 to February 23, 1781—the very period when the Virginia continental line was reorganized, under the resolutions of October, 1780, at Chesterfield, by a board of officers convened for that special purpose, the Baron Steuben presiding. Admitting that he was deranged at that period, the very circumstance entitles his heirs to commutation. That he was afterwards found serving at the siege of York, in the fall of that year, should not weaken but strengthen his claim. Then all the chivalry of Virginia, and every officer who had seen service, took the field, and crowded around the banner raised for liberty and our country. Sir, it is a plain case, and I will lose no more words upon it. All I desire and ask is a prompt and final decision; a decision just in itself, honorable to this House, and tending to secure the common good.

On motion of Mr. VINTON, the committee rose, reported progress, and obtained leave to sit again.

DEPOSITE BANKS.

The House proceeded to the consideration of the following resolution, heretofore offered by Mr. GARLAND, of Virginia:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury communicate to this House, if within his power, the dividends and surpluses which were declared by, and the surpluses and contingent funds remaining in, the several banks in which the public money is deposited, for the years 1833, 1834, 1835, and 1836, severally.

To which resolution the following amendment had been heretofore offered by Mr. HARLAN:

"And that he state, also, whether the salary or compensation of an agent at the seat of the General Government composes a part of the expenses of the said banks; the name of the said agent, and the several sums paid to him by the said institutions, respectively."

The pending question was on the motion submitted by Mr. HANNAGAN, when the subject was last under consideration, to lay the amendment and resolution on the table; on which motion the yeas and nays had heretofore been ordered, and, having been now taken, were: Yeas 28, nays 141.

So the House refused to lay the subject on the table.

Mr. GILLET thereupon withdrew his amendment; and the question recurring on the proposed amendment of Mr. HARLAN—

Mr. CUSHMAN called for the previous question; which the House refused to second: Yeas 71, nays 90.

So the previous question was not seconded.

The question on the adoption of the amendment again recurring,

Mr. GRANGER called for the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

Mr. HARLAN hoped that the House would not oppose the adoption of his amendment. It had been stated again and again, both in and out of the House, that a certain person residing in this city occupied a room in the Treasury Department, the rent of which was paid by that Department; that he communicated with these deposit banks; and that through him, under the frank of the Secretary of the Treasury, the correspondence of the banks was carried on. If there was such an agent, the people had a right to know it.

He (Mr. H.) did not pretend to assert whether there was such an agent or not; but he did say that the statements which had gone forth to that effect, through the public press and other channels, were sufficient ground on which to institute an inquiry, and to call for a distinct answer from the Secretary of the Treasury.

The deposit banks, it was said, had realized large sums by means of the public money. Two or three years before the charter of the United States Bank expired, these deposits were taken from that institution, the place pointed out by law for their safe keeping. What amount the Government might have lost, he could not tell. But it was necessary the people should know what was done with their money, and whether any confidential agent existed, who, under the sanction of the Secretary of the Treasury, had the control of these institutions.

Mr. GARLAND, of Virginia, said that his only object in offering the resolution had been to ascertain what profits had been realized by these banks, out of moneys deposited there, for which the Government had no use. As regarded the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Kentucky, it would be remembered that when the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. WISE,] at a former period, offered a resolution in a more extended form, asking for an inquiry into alleged abuses in the Treasury Department, he (Mr. G.) had voted for that inquiry, and he would do so again. But he could not regard the amendment now proposed as pertinent to the resolution. Still, he would vote for it. He would ask, however, were these deposit banks chartered by the Government of the United States, or did they owe any responsibility to the Government, except so far as they had entered into contracts? They did not; and if the banks thought proper to expend their money in the employment of an agent at Washington, or elsewhere, they had a right to do so, so long as they did not expend a dollar of the public money. If it could be shown that there was any improper connexion between R. M. Whitney, the individual so often referred to, or any other person, and the Treasury Department and deposit banks, he (Mr. G.) was willing to know the truth, and to correct the evil, if it existed. It had been charged that the friends of the administration wished to conceal hidden fraud and corruption. Let them meet the charges coming from a gentleman politically opposed to them; let him have as full an inquiry as possible; and, although he (Mr. G.) could not consider the amendment as intimately connected with the resolution, still he would never close his eyes upon any fraud, corruption, or mismanagement, come from what quarter it would; and he would never deny any inquiry which might lead to its detection. He did not believe that fraud or corruption could be discovered, but he was desirous to give the opportunity.

Mr. THOMPSON, of South Carolina, expressed the gratification which he had felt in listening to the sentiments expressed by the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. GARLAND.] Without reflecting on the motives of others, he (Mr. T.) thanked that gentleman for the manly and honorable course he had taken in this matter.

The subject of Reuben M. Whitney's connexion with the Treasury was one of deep excitement in every part of the Union. He (Mr. T.) had forbore to make any charges or insinuations, until he had evidence before him. Now, he desired that the evidence sought by the amendment should be procured, for it had a most important bearing on the whole subject. And he must be permitted to say that, if he did not raise the cry of democracy so loudly and so constantly as some men, he was yet democrat enough to have confidence that the people of this country would do what was right, when they understood what was right; and any opposition to this investigation would come with an ill grace from those who professed themselves to be the friends of the people. He wished to know what was the nature of R. M. Whitney's connexion with these banks, and what compensation he received. Let the suspicions which were abroad be either put down or confirmed. Whatever this individual's connexion might turn out to be with the banks, he (Mr. T.) believed it to be an absolute autocracy; he believed that the "sic volo, sic jubeo" of R. M. Whitney placed money in the banks and took money out of them. He believed such to be the fact, though he did not know it; and if R. M. Whitney had this power, was it not all-important that the people should know it? He (Mr. T.) had nothing to say about his character; but he desired to know whether R. M. Whitney was not influenced by douceurs from these banks; whether it was true that he received fifty thousand dollars a year, as had been stated. A bank which had a million of the public money on deposit, which was yielding $60,000 per annum, could readily afford to pay a part of the compensation named. He (Mr. T.) thought his suspicions that such a sum was paid would be confirmed. In any event, he desired to submit the case to the American people, with a full knowledge of all the circumstances. He hoped the gentlemen opposed to him would meet him fully in this instance. If all was fair, as it should be, and as he trusted it might prove to be, let the friends of the administration have all the benefit which would result from the refutation of the charges.

Mr. D. J. PEARCE said he had voted to lay the resolution and amendment on the table, because he was opposed both to the one and the other.

He was in favor of any resolution directing inquiry into any department of the Government where, in the nature of things, it was proper the inquiry should be made. He considered the whole proposition as a work of supererogation. He would vote for the resolution, if any gentleman who viewed the subject in a different light from himself would put it in a proper shape. If the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. HARLAN] wanted a committee appointed on the part of the House, to ascertain whether the Secretary of the Treasury had assumed banking privileges; whether R. M. Whitney was stationed here as the agent of the deposit banks, with a view of giving him privileges above other individuals, and of receiving from the Secretary of the Treasury a protection which the Secretary could not correctly confer upon another man, nor legally upon him, (R. M. W.); if, in short, the question was to resolve itself into one of malfeasance or malversation in office, he (Mr. P.) was willing, for one, that the committee should be raised, that the gentleman from Kentucky should be at the head of it, and that he should fully investigate all charges, so far as they can be made against the Secretary of the Treasury.

But suppose that Reuben M. Whitney was the agent of the deposit banks. He was not an agent under any act of Congress, or under any power which the Secretary of the Treasury could exercise. He was the agent by virtue of a contract between him and the deposit banks. What right had the House or the Secretary of the Treasury to ask these banks if they had an agent, or what compensation was given to him? They might answer the question if they thought proper; and if they did not think proper to answer it, the House would be no wiser by adopting this resolution.

It had been said that R. M. Whitney was seen in this city, sometimes in his office, sometimes reading newspapers; and because he was so seen, the House was to adopt a resolution making these formal inquiries from the Secretary of the Treasury. So far as any thing could be brought to bear on the Secretary of the Treasury, showing an improper connexion between him and R. M. Whitney, or any other individual, he (Mr. P.) was willing to go for an inquiry; but as to these roving investigations, these inquisitions, he had expressed his opinion against them; he believed that no benefit was to be derived from them by the American people, and that their only effect would be to agitate the public mind. So much (said Mr. P.) for Reuben M. Whitney, who (Mr. P. apprehended) was one day to become a great man, on the ground that those who were great were indebted for their elevation more to their enemies than their friends; and who, but for the fictitious consequence which he had gathered from the thousand rumors which had been circulated against him, might have glided on to his grave with the contemptible insensibility of an oyster, so far as Congress would have had any thing to do with him.

But as to the resolution itself. When did the bill by which these deposits were regulated become a law? At the last session of Congress, he believed. These banks would, no doubt, do what they had contracted to do under the deposit bill of the last session. They were under contracts with the Secretary of the Treasury—contracts entered into subsequent to the passage of that bill, and to the requirements of which they had conformed. But the resolution of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. GARLAND] goes back to the years 1835 and 1836. What right had the Secretary of the Treasury to call for this information? What control could he exercise over the banks, independent of what was contained in the contract under the deposit bill? Would the banks condescend to comply with such requirements? And if not, of what avail was the resolution, or what benefit could result from its adoption?

He saw no reason why the Secretary of the Treasury should make inquiries into these banks, rather than into any other banks, in order to know their surplus on hand. There was evil to be apprehended from the surplus on hand in all the banks; but this was the result of the banking system. If the object of the resolution really was to confer benefit on the public, then let the inquiry be extended to all similar institutions in the country. If Congress was to legislate at all, let them not legislate for the few, but for the whole. Let them legislate for the people, for the hewers of wood and the drawers of water; for those men who suffer, and are made to suffer, in consequence of these institutions.

Mr. TOUCEY said he could see no objection to the resolution, nor any substantial objection to the amendment. Could any gentleman object to a simple call for facts in possession of the Department, where it was deemed important to every member that they should be in possession of Congress? The gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. PEARCE] had inquired why not as well call for this information in relation to all the banks? He (Mr. T.) would answer. By a law passed at the last session of Congress, and by the course of the Department under that law, contracts had been entered into with these deposit banks; and, as a preliminary to the formation of these contracts, the banks were required to put the Department in possession of certain information in relation to their condition and business. For this reason he (Mr. T.) would limit the inquiry to these banks. With other banks Congress had nothing to do. He would, therefore, vote in favor of the resolution, and also of the amendment. A certain agent in the Treasury Department had been alleged to be in this city, performing certain acts. The House had already received a communication from the Treasury Department, stating that that individual had no connexion with that Department. He had no connexion, for aught Mr. T. knew, with the deposit banks; and, so far as he was aware, there was no impropriety in their employing such an agent. But if these banks had communicated facts to the Treasury Department in relation to that agent, which it was important for the House to know, let him communicate them.

The House did not ask for any information which these banks were not required to give by virtue of their contracts. They asked for information, so far as it was in the possession of the Department. He was for light; for fair investigation and inquiry; and, so far as it could properly be done, he would examine and sift the Department to the bottom. It was not for the House, nor for the Legislature, to refuse inquiry into any Department. This was not an inquisition; it was a proper and legal inquiry into a public Department, not necessarily involving the supposition that any thing was wrong. He hoped the inquiry would be allowed, and he appealed to the House to adopt the resolution, and thus throw open the door to discovery, if any thing there was to discover.

Mr. VANDERPOEL said that he apprehended that the amendment of the honorable gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. HARLAN] would not secure his object, at least if his object was to ascertain whether there was any agent, without the authority of law, connected with the Treasury Department, to correspond or communicate with the deposit banks. It had been often alleged here, as a matter of suspicion, if not of conviction, that an agent, unauthorized by law, and paid, probably, out of the public moneys, was employed by the Secretary of the Treasury to negotiate with the deposit banks. He would submit a resolution which would require the Secretary of the Treasury to respond distinctly to the point, whether such agency existed; and if so, who pays such agent. Mr. V. then submitted the following, as an amendment to the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky:

"And whether the Treasury Department has any agent or attorney, to correspond or communicate with said deposit banks, in relation to the public deposits; if so, who is such agent or correspondent, what compensation is allowed to him, and by whom is such allowance made or paid."

Pending which, the hour having elapsed, the House, on motion of Mr. E. WHITTLESEY, passed to the orders of the day, being the consideration of bills on the calendar of private business.

The House suspended the rule to enable Mr. THOMSON, of Ohio, to offer the following resolution, which was agreed to:

Resolved, That the use of this hall be allowed for an exhibition of the pupils of the New England Institution for the Education of the Blind, under the direction of Doctor S. G. Howe, on Tuesday next, at half past 10 o'clock A. M., for the space of one hour.

LOUIS DURETT.

The residue of the day was spent upon bills for relief of individuals and others.

Among other business,

The bill for the relief of the heirs of Louis Durett was read the third time.

Mr. LYON said he felt it his duty to oppose the passage of the bill in its present form, and would, when he had given a brief explanation of the case as he understood it, move to lay the bill on the table. It proposed to release to the heirs of Durett all title or claim of the United States to sixty arpens of land in the city of Mobile, of great value, and with very indefinite and uncertain boundaries. He said he had no knowledge of the merits of the claim, beyond what is afforded by the papers referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims. It may be (said Mr. L.) that the heirs of Durett are entitled to land in or near Mobile; but he was not sufficiently advised of the facts and circumstances connected with their claim to induce him to vote for the bill before the House, or consent to its passage in its present form. When the committee reported upon this case at the last session, Mr. L. said he had examined into it with a view to ascertain how or why it was that the claim embraced the particular quantity of sixty arpens square. It did not purport to be founded upon any French, British, or Spanish grant; and the United States had never disposed of lands by arpens, unless in confirming grants made by other Governments. He had applied to the Commissioner of the General Land Office, and requested him to examine the boundaries designated in the bill, and furnish him a map identifying the tract described in it. Mr. L. wished the information to enable him to determine if the claim would conflict with other claimants of real estate in Mobile; but was informed by the Commissioner that the bill did not furnish such a description of the boundaries of the tract proposed to be confirmed as would enable him to identify it on the map. Mr. L. said he was unable, from the want of certainty in the boundaries as described in the bill, to determine to what extent the sixty arpens square would conflict with the claims of others.

He had examined the several reports of the different boards of land commissioners appointed to examine and recommend such claims for confirmation, and the result of this examination had not satisfied him that the present bill ought to pass. In the report of actual settlers prior to the 3d of March, 1819, who had no claims derived from either the Spanish, French, or British Governments, made in 1820 by the board of commissioners east of Pearl river, the representatives of Louis Durett are reported for a lot below Mobile, settled from March, 1790, to April, 1820. The size or contents of this lot the commissioners failed to specify; but, at a subsequent time, a city lot, 64 by 128 feet, appears to have been surveyed for their claim. A still later report of the commissioners of private land claims shows that Joseph Durett asserted a claim before them for sixty arpens square in Mobile, as inhabited and cultivated from 1802 to 1807. This claim was reported as not entitled to confirmation, because not provided for by law.

An act of Congress, now in force, has created a tribunal for the examination, in the first instance, of cases like the one before the House. By the act of March, 1829, the register and receiver of the land district in which Mobile is embraced have been created a board of commissioners for the examination of cases like the present, with authority to report upon them, and, if established by proof, to recommend them for confirmation. This board is convenient to all interested, and it would be more regular and satisfactory for Congress to act upon the official report of the commissioners, than to rely upon testimony of which adverse claimants may have received no notice.

There was still another reason (Mr. L. said) why he could not consent to the passage of the bill. A respectable number of his constituents had, in a petition to Congress, requested that no final action should be had upon claims like the present, unless it be shown that adverse claimants had received notice of application being made to Congress to confirm them. The papers in this case did not show that any notice whatever had been given. He had no information as to the nature of any adverse claims to the land sought by the heirs of Durett; but, from the best location he could give the land, under the boundary described in the bill, it would seem to conflict with the claims of "De La Croix under Francis Collell," and "Joshua Kennedy under William McBoy," marked upon the map of Mobile in the General Land Office. He knew nothing of the nature of these claims, but it might be that they were as much entitled to a relinquishment of the title of the United States as Durett; at least, he was disposed that all should have a hearing; and an investigation into the merits of the conflicting claims could be had with more convenience to the parties before the board of land commissioners, in the country where the land is situated, and where the parties reside, than before Congress. Mr. L. said he was unwilling to vote for a confirmation of Durett's claim, without affording the other supposed adverse claimants an opportunity of being heard. The passage of the bill might do injustice to other claimants equally as much entitled to the same land, and he was not disposed to involve any portion of his constituents in unnecessary lawsuits. He was not prepared to say to what extent the bill would give rise to litigation; but as the case was important, and the value of the property very great, he preferred the claimants should come to Congress with a report from the board of land commissioners, setting forth all the important facts connected with the claim, and with such others as may interfere with it.

Mr. L. having moved to lay the bill on table, was requested by Mr. HUNTSMAN to withdraw the motion; and did so, in order to allow the latter gentleman to make some observations in support of the bill. After which,

Mr. LYON renewed his motion to lay the bill on the table, but finally, at the instance of Mr. GARLAND, of Louisiana, consented to a postponement of the bill to Friday next.

And then the House adjourned.

TUESDAY, JANUARY 3.

DEPOSITE BANKS.

The unfinished business of the morning hour was the following resolution, heretofore offered by Mr. GARLAND, of Virginia:

"Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury communicate to this House, if within his power, a statement of the dividends and surpluses which were declared by, and the surpluses and contingent funds remaining in, the several banks in which the public money is deposited, for the years 1833, 1834, 1835, and 1836, severally."

To which resolution the following amendment had been heretofore offered by Mr. HARLAN:

"And that he state, also, whether the salary or compensation of an agent at the seat of the General Government composes a part of the expenses of the said banks; the name of the said agent, and the several sums paid to him by the said institutions, respectively."

To which amendment Mr. VANDERPOEL heretofore offered the following amendment:

"And whether the Treasury Department has any agent or attorney, to correspond or communicate with said deposit banks in relation to the public deposits; if so, who is such agent or correspondent, what compensation is allowed to him, and by whom is such allowance made or paid."

Mr. PEYTON sent to the Chair an amendment, which substituted a committee, with power to send for persons and papers, for the Secretary of the Treasury.

The CHAIR decided that it was out of order to offer the amendment at that time.

Mr. PEYTON gave notice that, when in order, he would move so to amend the resolution and amendments as to refer the whole inquiry to a select committee, with power to send for persons and papers. He called upon his friends, and those who were friendly to an investigation, not to vote for the original resolution, or either of the amendments, in their present form. To what (said Mr. P.) do they amount? To nothing more than the resolution offered by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. DROMGOOLE] at the last session of Congress, against which we all voted. It is simply a call on the Secretary of the Treasury—an appeal to him to send us a whitewashing defence of himself and his friend Reuben Whitney, if he chose to do so. Why call on the Secretary of the Treasury? Do you call upon him to do his duty merely, or for something over, above, beyond his official power and duty? His duty is written, his power is defined in the law. Is it to be presumed that, if the obligations of law and official responsibility have had no effect upon him, a resolution of this House will be more powerful in its effects? Let us advert to the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury. What does the act of Congress require at his hands?

"SEC. 3. No bank shall hereafter be selected and employed by the Secretary of the Treasury as a depository of the public money, until such bank shall have furnished to the said Secretary a statement of its condition and business," &c.

"SEC. 4. Each bank shall furnish to the Secretary of the Treasury, from time to time, as often as he may require, not exceeding once a week, statements setting forth its condition and business, &c. And the said banks shall furnish to the Secretary of the Treasury, and to the Treasurer of the United States, a weekly statement of the condition of his account upon their books. And the Secretary of the Treasury shall have the right, by himself or an agent appointed for that purpose, to inspect such general accounts in the books of the bank as shall relate to the said statements," &c.

"SEC. 10. That it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to lay before Congress, at the commencement of each annual session, a statement of the number and names of the banks employed as depositories of the public money, and of their condition, and the amount of the public money deposited in each, as shown by their returns at the Treasury; and if the selection of any bank as a depository of the public money be made by the Secretary of the Treasury while Congress is in session, he shall immediately report the name and condition of said bank to Congress; and if any such selection shall be made during the recess of Congress, he shall report the same to Congress during the first week of its next session."

There, sir, is the Secretary's power, broad and ample. Here is his duty, plain and explicit. Has the Secretary failed in either? Has he omitted to exercise that power which has been conferred upon him for the care and safety of the public money? Or has he failed to make his annual report, as required by the act of Congress? Or, as has been intimated by the gentleman from Rhode Island, [Mr. D. J. PEARCE], is it a call upon the Secretary for something which he does not officially know? The resolution begins thus: "Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury communicate to this House, if within his power," &c. Now, sir, this either means to require the Secretary to give the House that information which the law made it his duty to communicate to Congress at its meeting, or it appeals to him for that which is unknown to him officially, and is placed beyond his power by the law itself. In either point of view, this call is useless, is absurd. If he has done his duty, and given the House all the information within his power, why ask him again to do so? If he has failed in this—if he has stood out in contempt of the laws of his country, in violation of his official obligations—why appeal to him by way of resolution? If there is any well-founded suspicion of this, it would furnish a conclusive reason why a committee should be raised. But, sir, suppose the object is to call upon the Secretary, not as a public officer, to make an official communication to this House, but as an individual, to give us his private views and opinions in relation to the subjects mentioned. I am still more opposed to that course. Strip the Secretary of his ministerial robes, of his official power, and what right has he to make any communication to this House? No, sir; I wish to bring him to the book—to his oath before a committee. Any other course will be trifling with the dignity of this body.

I am equally opposed to the amendment offered by my friend from Kentucky [Mr. HARLAN] in its present form, and for the same reason, because it appeals to the Secretary for information. It reads thus: "And that he [the Secretary] state, also, whether the salary or compensation of an agent at the seat of the General Government composes a part of the expenses of said banks; the name of the said agent, and the several sums paid to him by said institutions, respectively." Now, sir, I do not wish to hear one word from the Secretary about that agent, unless it is upon oath; and I think that my friend from Kentucky will agree with me as to the means of effecting the object. I agree with him fully in the end, and I hope we will not differ as to the best, and in my judgment the only, means of effecting it. If the Secretary is cognizant of any thing improper, it was his duty, as a faithful officer, as a man of honor, to have made it known. But, sir, I suppose he too considers Reuben Whitney a private citizen, the agent of the banks and not of the Treasury. Sir, during the present session of Congress I had occasion to go into the Treasury Department, and, on shoving open the front door, the first thing that met my eye, full in front, was R. M. Whitney, blazing in capitals as large as the sign of a livery stable. Now, sir, if he is a private citizen, what is he doing with a sign? If he has quit business stealing, why not take down his sign? What is he doing in the Treasury Department? How came he there? You might as well turn a horse into a new ground field, and tell him not to bite the pumpkins, as to turn Reuben Whitney into the Treasury, and tell him not to steal the money. Suspicion is aroused, it is abroad through the country every where in relation to this man's mysterious connexion with the Treasury; and the very efforts to shield him have greatly increased those suspicions. It is true that the gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. D. J. PEARCE] has predicted that Reuben is to be a great man, made so by his enemies; I am willing to make him greater. I am anxious to give him an opportunity to blazon his virtues, and make him "great only as he is good." But what constitutes a great man at this day, according to that gentleman's conceptions of greatness? The first item in the account of this man's greatness is, that he was charged and convicted, by his own confessions upon oath, before a committee of this House, of having been a traitor to his country during the last war. The second item in the account is, that he was convicted of perjury by the same committee, a majority of whom were his political friends. And, lastly, that he is suspected, upon evidence strong enough to send a poor man to the penitentiary, of plundering the Treasury; of being a sort of general, federal rogue, employed by a company to steal by the year for them. This closes the account. And Reuben truly has a claim to greatness—a great traitor, a great liar, and a great rogue.

I wish this investigation to be made by a committee of this House, composed of men, as I hope it will be, too generous to persecute even Reuben Whitney, and too just to favor the Secretary of the Treasury. And then Reuben may point to his patriotic deeds during the war; to the evidence of his truth in his examination in 1832, and to the honesty and fairness of his conduct in relation to the public money.

Mr. Speaker, in the Globe of this morning I read an article which squints at throwing Reuben overboard. It is time the Secretary had cut loose; that he had unlashd himself from him. "If you will tell me who you live with, I will tell you who you are," is an adage not more trite than true. This Secretary and this same "great" man have been housed together since his appointment to the station he fills. I will call the attention of the House to a few facts, which will show whether Reuben M. Whitney has any claim to the shield which has been thrown around him, under the name of private citizen; and whether the Secretary is not the last man in the nation who should be appealed to as his judge. Whitney has assumed the responsibility of speaking in the name of that Secretary to the officers of Government, who are bound to obey him, and those functionaries recognised and obeyed his instructions. This could not have escaped the knowledge of the Secretary. Whitney was his friend, his daily associate, his bosom crony. Not only so, but Whitney's instructions, given by authority of the Secretary, were in one instance made public in the newspapers, and republished in the journals of this city. He gave instructions to the receivers in the land offices what kind of money they should receive in payment for public lands. And, in conclusion, he holds the power of the Secretary of the Treasury in terror over the heads of the receivers, threatening them in his name, and by his authority, in case of complaint. Were these the acts of a private citizen? Does the Secretary stand in a relation so impartial that his word, his bare ipse dixit, will be satisfactory? Sir, is it not giving Reuben Whitney power over the currency? The power to destroy that equality of competition for the public domain, which is the birthright of every American citizen? How dare he say to a receiver of public money that the paper of this solvent specie-paying bank shall be excluded, when offered by one citizen, and the paper of another shall be received? And, to insure obedience to his mandate, he threatens the receiver with the power of the Secretary of the Treasury. Here is his circular, which was first published in a new Van Buren paper in Missouri. The editor had not been long in the ranks, or he never would have made the disclosure.

From the Missouri Republican, May 14, 1836.

THE PUBLIC MONIES.—The Globe, in the month of September last, published the details of an arrangement made by the different deposit banks, by which the long-promised "better currency," as that paper then styled it, was to be secured to the country. The details, as we have said, were given, but it did not appear that the arrangement was the fruit of Reuben M. Whitney's labors; nor has this fact, so far as we know, been alluded to at any time. Such, however, was the case. A new Van Buren paper has been recently started at Palmyra, in this State, called the "Marion Journal," the first number of which contains a communication from Mr. Blakely, receiver of public moneys for that district, in which a "circular," embodying the whole arrangement, with instructions from "R. M. Whitney," is inserted. The receiver commences with these remarkable words: "I am instructed to receive in payment for public lands the notes on the following banks;" and then copies the circular, dated "Washington, August 21, 1835."

The opening paragraph—which, as well as those parts inserted below, was suppressed by the Globe—reads thus: "I have the pleasure to inform you that, since my circular to you of the 25th June last, I have received communications from the greater part of the deposit banks, upon the subject of redeeming such of their notes in New York and Philadelphia as may be received on deposit from receivers of proceeds of public lands, as well as receiving from such receivers the notes of such of the deposit and other banks as redeem the same either in New York or Philadelphia; and I am now enabled to communicate to you the arrangements made with the following banks."

Then follow the "arrangements" announced, and which we have already published. Mr. Whitney closes his circular by saying:

"These arrangements have been entered into with the understanding and full reliance that each bank will act towards the other in fairness, and with most sacred fidelity; that no one will call upon any other to redeem their notes which have not been received from the public receivers, or in payment of public dues, in cases where the banks have extended the limitation that far."

"I have forwarded a copy of this to each of the public receivers, and I have no doubt but they will act with such fairness that no injustice will be done to any one of the deposit banks. Should it ever be otherwise, and any one of the banks have cause to feel aggrieved, I am authorized by the Secretary of the Treasury to say that he will take the most prompt measures to remove any just cause of complaint."

"It is expected, by all the banks which have come into the arrangement, that when one forwards for redemption, at the places named, the notes of any other bank, it will, at the same time, inform such bank of the amount which it has thus sent forward."

"I would suggest that, in case any one of the deposit banks which have not entered into this arrangement shall hereafter do so, they communicate the terms, &c. to me, that the same may be communicated to the others, as well as to the public receivers."

"As it will greatly increase the security against counterfeits, I would suggest that each deposit bank which has or may enter into this arrangement forward to each of the other deposit banks, and to each of the public receivers, the signatures of their respective presidents and cashiers. For this purpose, I forward with this a list of the public receivers, with the places of their residence."

"I am, very respectfully, your obedient servant,
"R. M. WHITNEY."

In the course of the investigations, newspaper and otherwise, which have taken place within the last few months, it has been boldly denied that R. M. Whitney had any connexion with the Treasury Department. In his letter to the publishers of the Globe, of the 5th of March last, he represents himself as the agent "of a number of the most respectable deposit banks," employed to reside at Washington, to act as their corresponding agent, and to look after their interests generally. The Globe denied that he had any official connexion with the Treasury; and an inquiry was objected to in Congress, because he was a private citizen. The circular before us, however, unveils his true character. He has, beyond a doubt, the control of all the funds received into the Treasury from the sale of public lands; he avowedly acts under authority from the Secretary of the Treasury, and threatens all erring banks with "prompt measures to remove any just cause of complaint;" he is recognised as a Treasury officer by the receiver who published the circular; for Mr. B. expressly says, "I am instructed," &c., and goes on to quote the letter of instructions. Either this must be the case—either he is an accredited officer of the Treasury Department, or he must be a private citizen, the agent "of a number of respectable banks," if you choose, but still having the exclusive regulation of the currency, and the control of eleven millions or more of money received for public lands annually. When before has the spectacle been presented to us of a private citizen giving peremptory instructions to Government officers, and wielding many millions of public money for the benefit of banks paying him a high price for his services?

Mr. Blakely, the receiver, commences, "I am instructed." By whom? By this private gentleman, Reuben M. Whitney? To do what? To receive in payment for public lands the notes on the following banks, &c. He (Whitney) speaks of other circulars which he had sent on before this. And what does he direct shall be done? That the notes of such banks as redeem the same in New York and Philadelphia shall be receivable in payment for the public lands. And, in conclusion, which puts it beyond doubt that the Secretary was privy to this assumption of power, he says: "Should it ever be otherwise, and any one of the banks have cause to feel aggrieved, I am authorized by the Secretary of the Treasury to say that he will take the most prompt measures to remove any just cause of complaint." And yet Reuben is a private citizen, and the Secretary is called on to say so, upon honor.

Sir, this association of the Secretary with Whitney is not creditable to him. Who is Whitney? What did the Secretary know him to be? Why did he ever countenance such a man in so responsible a station? I heard a gentleman of the first respectability, of the highest honor and most commanding talents, of the city of Baltimore, who was a personal friend to Mr. Taney, though a political opponent, say to a friend of mine in this city, during the last session of Congress, that when it was first rumored that Reuben M. Whitney was to be the agent employed by the Treasury Department to perform the duties of the station which he now fills, as it appears, under the employment of the deposit banks, he wrote to Mr. Taney, giving Whitney's character, from the time of his treason down to the day of his perjury, and expressing a hope that Mr. Taney would not give countenance to such a man, blackened as he was with infamy, and rank with treason. Mr. Taney replied that he need give himself no uneasiness; that he knew Whitney's character too well to give him any such employment. But, sir, no sooner is Mr. Taney gone, than Reuben breaks into the Treasury, where he has been ever since, and wields its power to the destruction of the currency and prosperity of the country, and the equal rights of the citizen. Yes, sir, this is the man for whose examination, before a committee of this House, we have been clamoring so long in vain. And I blush to say that a majority of the House of Representatives are afraid—yes, sir, they are ashamed of it; but they dare not grant the investigation. I cannot account for this. It cannot be for any love they bear Whitney. It must be that he has their leaders in his power; that they fear he will turn state's evidence if they expose and cast him off; and they are obliged to hug him to their bosoms, corrupt mass as he is.

Sir, this private citizen has, as it has been stated, (and I have it in such a way that I cannot doubt the fact,) when the public money was deposited in the bank of a city—(I will not even name the city, lest it might lead to the punishment of the institution; I will not knowingly be the cause of inflicting injury on any man or on any institution; for I am sure that the officers of those institutions subject to Whitney's power are restrained from volunteering statements against him, but will cheerfully come forward under a subpoena, and disclose all they may know)—but, sir, soon after the deposit was made in the bank to which I allude, a letter came on from Mr. Whitney, suggesting the importance of having an agent at this city; that he was the agent for many of the deposit banks, and would undertake a like agency for that bank at an enormous salary, which he named. The bank declined having any connexion with him whatever; and, sir, very soon the deposits began to dwindle in that institution, and accumulate in another, which was in the same city, of which Whitney was agent. Now, sir, what is this? Is it not putting up the public money by Reuben M. Whitney at auction, to the highest bidder, for his own benefit, amongst the banks? Will not that bank give most for its use which is hardest pressed for means? And will not the safety of the public money be thereby jeopardized? Now, this way of starving a bank out of its deposits is a cunning device to evade the law, which requires that no removal of money shall be made but for certain causes therein specified; and that the Secretary shall report to Congress the cause of removal. But, sir, when money is thus removed under Reuben's system, we get no report—the Secretary knows nothing of it officially.

Sir, I have searched in vain for the contract between the Treasury Department and the deposit bank of this city, during this morning. I regret my inability to find it; for if my memory does not very much mislead me, I once saw that contract, or a copy, or an extract from it, wherein it appeared that the Secretary of the Treasury reserved the right to appoint an agent, such an agent as Whitney is said to be. But yet he appoints no agent; for, if he appointed the agent, all he did would necessarily appear in the Department, and the Secretary would be compelled to make annual reports of his doings to Congress; but, by shifting the employment of the agent upon the deposit banks, this is all evaded; and still a hint from the Secretary, through a friend, would be sufficient to control the appointment. Now, is this right? Is it not putting the banks in the power of the agent? It is granting him a letter of marque and reprisal upon the banks, which he may plunder at pleasure.

Sir, it had not been my purpose to say any thing on this proposition. In conclusion, I hope that those gentlemen with whom I have heretofore acted will not vote for either the resolution or the amendments, unless the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. GARLAND] will accept the amendment for the appointment of a select committee. In this form, I will vote for the resolution with all my heart; and I appeal to the gentleman to accept the amendment. Unless this is done, the effect of the resolution really will be to smother and conceal, though I am sure, from the frank, bold, and manly bearing of that gentleman, such is not his design.

Mr. GARLAND, of Virginia, said that the gentleman from Tennessee had done him no more than justice, in expressing his belief that he had no desire to conceal fraud or corruption in the Treasury Department or any other. Whilst he (Mr. G.) stood here as the representative of a free and enlightened people, he would never, by any vote or act of his, attempt to conceal from the public view any fraud or corruption, come in whatsoever shape or form it might. But when he had offered this resolution, the gentleman from Tennessee was not in his seat. At that time, he (Mr. G.) avowed that the only object he had in view was to elicit a simple fact in relation to a pending inquiry, having reference to the revenue of the country. At that time, he had not the most remote idea that any inquiry in regard to R. M. Whitney and the Treasury Department would have been appended to this resolution, no more than that he should have been transported to the moon. His friend from Virginia, [Mr. WISE,] who was not now in his seat, had submitted a resolution, which had been made the order of the day for this day, involving this identical inquiry in reference to this supposed agent, and thus it would be made in two forms. But did not the gentleman from Tennessee recollect that when the resolution was presented at the last session of Congress by the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. WISE,] he (Mr. G.) had voted in favor of its adoption? Three times he had voted for similar inquiries, and he would continue to vote for them until doomsday. What were the terms of the present resolution? Certainly they were not liable to the criticism of the gentleman from Tennessee. They were, simply, that the Secretary of the Treasury should inform the House, if in his power to do so, what were the dividends, &c. of these banks. It was simply an inquiry, for it could not be supposed that the Secretary of the Treasury had any power to exact the information. Was not this the most respectful form in which the inquiry could be addressed? Had a committee of this House any more power to exact the information than the Secretary of the Treasury? Where was such power derived? From the constitution, or from the bodies by whom these banks had been incorporated? He would like to know where the power was to compel the banks to give the information. But he could not suppose that any of the deposit banks would have any interest in refusing the information, and he had no doubt they would furnish it to the Secretary of the Treasury. The information, however, was such as ought to be procured.

In reference to the amendment, he would not now undertake to investigate the character of Mr. Whitney. That individual might be all that the gentleman from Tennessee seemed to suppose, or he might not be. If these propositions for amendments had reference purely to the investigation of R. M. Whitney's character—whether he was a traitor or a perjured felon—he (Mr. G.) should not vote to employ the time of the House or of a committee in such an investigation. It was a subject with which the House had nothing to do. But yet, these suspicions, coming from high sources—from the representatives of the people—charging that there was an illegitimate, illegal, and corrupt connexion between Whitney and these deposit banks and the Treasury Department, came in a form which he was prepared to meet, and to which he was prepared to give a proper investigation. And, if the investigation was allowed, what wrong would thereby be done? There was no fear of the innocent being made guilty by investigation. Virtue, honesty, and integrity, sought and desired no concealment. Truth, when unadorned, was most adorned. He believed that no such improper connexion existed; it was, however, a matter of opinion. Still, when an investigation was urged on this floor, when it was urged from all quarters of the country, it was due to the Government, to the people, and to the Secretary of the Treasury himself, that the inquiry should not be withheld. If any one was guilty, and if any improper connexion existed, it would then be exposed to public view; fraud or corruption, if any, should be exposed, and the officer guilty of it removed from public trust. But if the persons charged should be found innocent, the responsibility would rest on the accusers. They had made the charges; and if those charges were shown to be without foundation, the innocent man would be reinstated in public confidence, because he had passed the fiery ordeal, and had come out pure and uncorrupted.

He would appeal, then, to the political friends of the Secretary of the Treasury on this floor, to meet this inquiry in the broadest form in which it could be presented. The Secretary, conscious of his innocence, would not shrink from investigation. Let the House reflect on the consequences of such charges remaining unanswered. To them was intrusted the preservation of our free institutions, and the protection of the liberties of the American people; and upon the purity with which the laws were administered depended their perpetuity. The Government, and those who governed, should, like Cæsar's wife, be not only innocent, but unsuspected; and when even a suspicion of impropriety was thrown upon them, if substantiated, let them be driven back as the gloom of night is driven before the rays of the rising sun. Let this House, then, inquire who this Reuben M. Whitney is. He (Mr. G.) believed every thing was right; if not, let the wrong be exposed. Let the investigation take place, and facts might then be brought to light, not of a one-sided or partisan character, but, as in a court of justice, both sides would be heard, and so the truth might be known.

Mr. G. then intimated his desire to modify his resolution; when

Mr. HARLAN withdrew his amendment; consequently the amendment of Mr. VANDERPOEL fell; so that the resolution was before the House in its original form.

Mr. GARLAND, of Virginia, then submitted the following, as a modification of his resolution:

Resolved, That a committee of nine members be appointed, whose duty it shall be to inquire whether the several banks employed for the deposit of the public money have all, or any of them, by joint or several contract, employed an agent to reside at the seat of Government, to transact their business with the Treasury Department; what is the character of the business which he is so employed to transact, and what compensation he receives; whether said agent, if there be one, has been employed at the request or through the procurement of the Treasury Department; whether the business of the Treasury Department with said banks is conducted through said agent; and whether, in the transaction of any business confided to said agent, he receives any compensation from the Treasury Department; and that said committee have power to send for persons and papers, if they deem it necessary.

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury communicate to this House, if within his power, a statement of the dividends and surpluses which were declared by, and the surpluses and contingent funds remaining in, the several banks in which the public money is deposited, for the years 1833, 1834, 1835, and 1836, severally.

Mr. McKAY then submitted the following amendment, to come in as a second resolution:

Resolved, further, That the Secretary of the Treasury report the average amount of public moneys each of said banks has had on deposit on the first day of each quarter, in the aforesaid years, respectively, together with any other information which will show what proportion of said dividends and surpluses has been derived by the said banks for the use of the public money; also, as far as it can be ascertained, what have been the dividends and surpluses of an equal number of the banks than those that have the public moneys, for the last two years.

Mr. GARLAND, of Virginia, accepted this amendment, as a modification of his resolutions.

Mr. GARLAND, of Louisiana, then moved to strike out of the second resolution the word "average," and insert the word "actual," so as to make it read "actual amount of public moneys," &c.; which motion, after some explanation by Mr. G. and Mr. McKAY, was agreed to.

Mr. ADAMS then moved to strike out of the first resolution, after the words "and that said committee have power to send for persons and papers," the words "if they deem it necessary to do so."

Mr. GARLAND, of Virginia, accepted this as a modification.

Mr. ADAMS then called for a division of the question, so as to take the question separately on each resolution.

The first and second resolutions were then agreed to without a division.

Mr. CHAMBERS, of Kentucky, called for the yeas and nays on the third resolution; which were ordered, and the resolution adopted unanimously.

EXECUTIVE ADMINISTRATION.

The orders of the day being called for, the CHAIR announced the resolution originally submitted by Mr. WISE, and reported from the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, proposing an inquiry into the executive departments, and the amendment of Mr. PEARCE, of Rhode Island, as given below.

Mr. HANNEGAN remarked, that as the hour was late, and as the Western States had heretofore been excluded from the opportunity of offering resolutions, he moved to postpone the subject till to-morrow for that purpose.

Mr. PICKENS, who was entitled to the floor, said he had no particular objection to postpone the subject for one day, for the reason urged by the gentleman from Indiana, provided it was understood that it be made the special order for to-morrow. He added that he had no wish, on his own part, that it should be postponed a moment longer, nor would he be instrumental in having it so, for he was quite prepared to go on.

Mr. JARVIS hoped it would not be postponed. Unless the resolutions were merely intended as a peg to hang speeches upon, there was no use in postponing them; for if it was intended to raise the proposed committee, there was no time to spare.

The motion to postpone was lost, and the resolutions were then read.

The first, as reported from the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, was as follows:

Resolved, That so much of the President's message as relates to the 'condition of the various executive departments, the ability and integrity with which they have been conducted, the vigilant and faithful discharge of the public business in all of them, and the causes of complaint, from any quarter, at the manner in which they have fulfilled the objects of their creation,' be referred to a select committee, to consist of nine members, with power to send for persons and papers, and with instructions to inquire into the condition of the various executive departments, the ability and integrity with which they have been conducted, into the manner in which the public business has been discharged in all of them, and into all causes of complaint, from any quarter, at the manner in which said departments, or their bureaus or offices, or any of their officers or agents, of every description whatever, directly or indirectly connected with them in any manner, officially or unofficially, in duties pertaining to the public interest, have fulfilled or failed to accomplish the objects of their creation, or have violated their duties, or have injured and impaired the public service and interest; and that said committee, in its inquiries, may refer to such periods of time as to them may seem expedient and proper."

The question pending was the following amendment, moved by Mr. PEARCE, of Rhode Island. Strike out all after the word "resolved," and insert the following:

"That so much of the President's message as is in the following words, to wit: 'Before concluding this paper, I think it is due to the various executive departments to bear testimony to their prosperous condition, and to the ability and integrity with which they have been conducted. It has been my aim to enforce in all of them a vigilant and faithful discharge of the public business; and it is gratifying to me to believe that there is no just cause of complaint, from any quarter, at the manner in which they have fulfilled the objects of their creation,' be referred to a select committee of nine members, with instructions to inquire into any specific causes of complaint which may be alleged against the integrity of the administration of any of the departments or their bureaus, of the vigilance and fidelity with which their duties have been discharged; and that said committee have power to send for persons and papers."

Mr. PICKENS observed that it had not been originally his intention, when this resolution was first brought before the House by his friend from Virginia, [Mr. WISE,] to have taken any part in the debate; but from what he had heard in the course of this important discussion, the strange and he must say monstrous doctrines which he had heard advanced by the supporters of the administration, he had been led to change his original intention, and would now, therefore, offer a few observations on this subject.

In opposition to the resolution which calls for a select committee, with power to make a thorough investigation into the conduct of the departments, we have been told that there are already standing committees in existence, constituted by this House, with full powers to make all the investigations which are proposed by this resolution. Let any gentleman (said Mr. P.) read the rules and the duties assigned to those committees, and I put it to this House if such an asseveration is any thing else but a shallow and flimsy pretext, brought forward with the design of disguising and covering an unworthy vote against the appointment of the select committee called for by the original resolution.

The duties of the standing committees of the House are to investigate accounts, to inquire into the various expenditures of the different departments, of the disbursements made, and the vouchers of our public officers, &c. They were never intended to embrace such objects as are contemplated in the resolution of the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. WISE.] These standing committees never supposed it to be within their range of duties to investigate the transactions of your officers with the land speculations of the country, or that stupendous tissue of fraud, peculation, and villainy, connected with your Indian agencies, Indian reservations, their locations and transfers, which, if ever fully revealed, will develop a system of legalized crime and plunder utterly disgraceful to any civilized Government. Beside, all those transactions connected with the deposite banks and, their agents, so full of suspicion, come peculiarly under the cognizance of a select committee, with the power to send for persons and papers, which power is not given to the standing committees of the House.

But, sir, (said Mr. P.) amongst the various efforts and pretexts ingeniously raised to smother the inquiry now called for, there was one argument, if it can be called such, that fell from the gentleman from New York, [Mr. MANN,] which excited in him the profoundest astonishment and surprise. That gentleman intimated that the demand for a select committee to inquire into the departments, to send for persons and papers, and to probe into the dark deeds of unfaithful public agents, is unconstitutional! He [Mr. MANN] says that this proceeding is to be viewed in the light of a general search warrant! and therefore argues that it is contrary to the constitution!

Mr. P. then read the clause in the amendments to the constitution on that point, as follows: "The right of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers, and effects, against unreasonable searches and seizures, shall not be violated; and no warrant shall issue but upon probable cause, supported by oath or affirmation, and particularly describing the place to be searched and the person or thing to be seized." Now, sir, (said Mr. P.,) since the time when Algernon Sidney had his private papers in his private apartments searched, because they were supposed to contain treason against a suspicious and arbitrary Government, such an idea as is now attempted to be extorted from this clause in the constitution, he would venture to say, had never entered into the mind of any man. So, then, according to this perverted and strange interpretation, that great principle, incorporated into the system of English liberty, and transferred to our constitution, which was intended to raise a shield over the rights of private citizens against the lawless search of a usurping and despotic Government, is now to be understood as intended and designed to protect and screen a bad Government and its evil agents in deeds of fraud, corruption, and malversation. Yes, sir, (said Mr. P.,) this clause in your constitution, according to learned commentators of these profligate times, is not intended to protect the people against encroachments of a harassing Government, but to cover Government from the scrutinizing inquiries of a free people! It is a clause intended to shield the officers of a corrupt dynasty in their abandoned career of fraud and peculation, but not designed to protect private citizens against capricious and unwarrantable search into their private dwellings and private papers! Surely such an idea as this could never enter the mind of any man, except one who had bowed the knee of sycophancy so long before the throne of power that his heart was prepared to worship at the shrine of any image which his master might hold up as the popular idol of the day.

Sir, (said Mr. P.,) it is the first time in my life that I ever heard that the papers, records, and documents, of public offices, and of the officers, were to be viewed as private property, belonging to private individuals, and, as such, to be exempted from inquiry and investigation. Such a doctrine he confessed was new to him; it is a doctrine directly at war with liberty; it is a doctrine calculated to lead to the most monstrous and fatal results. And if this is to be the doctrine practised upon by the coming administration, it is full time that a deceived country should know it. No, sir; all the papers and documents, all the offices of this Government, are not private; they belong not to private gentlemen, they are not sheltered by the constitution from investigation; they are the property of the confederacy, and the right over them, the right to search, the right of thorough investigation, belongs to this House, belongs to us, the representatives of a free people. We stand here as guardians of popular rights, as a co-ordinate and independent branch of this Government; and we are base traitors to our country if we diminish or weaken our rights, if we abandon the proud prerogatives guaranteed to us under the constitution we have sworn to defend.

Again, sir: the amendment to this resolution which has been proposed by the gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. D. J. PEARCE] has not excited less surprise and astonishment in my mind than the doctrine I have just adverted to. Mr. P. said he could view that amendment as nothing more than a pretext to shield the perpetrators of fraud against all inquiry and discovery by the people. If (said Mr. P.) I was not mistaken in what that gentleman maintained, I understood him to say that the officers of the Government are agents of the Executive; that they are responsible alone to the Executive; and that he (the Executive) is responsible to the American people, and may be impeached before the Senate by the vote of this House. Such, in substance, was the argument of the gentleman. According to this doctrine, the people, by their representatives, have no control whatever over the officers of the Government; they are independent of the people, distinct from the people, and removed out of our reach and out of our power. But I would have that gentleman to know that we, as well as the officers of the Government, constitute a part of the Government; we, the representatives of the people, create by statutes these offices, and define the duties of the officers; we fix and pay their salaries; they are officers of this House as well as of the Executive himself, created by our authority, and amenable to us for all their conduct. I know that, for the last six or eight years, the contrary doctrine has been inculcated and enforced; this House has only been considered as a part of the Executive, whose only duty was to record the edicts of royalty, or give sanction to its wishes. There can be no more certain evidence of the decay of this republic, than for this House to sleep upon its privileges, and quietly acquiesce under the accumulation of executive power. But, sir, I call upon every gentleman who feels himself to be a freeman, the representative of a free people, not to abandon their proud prerogative, but to claim the high character and privilege of this House to know their power, and to have the independence to assert it. Yes, sir, I invoke the spirit of the entombed constitution to preside over and guard the power and the privileges of this House. I am utterly opposed to this modern doctrine, which makes us the mere agents of the Executive, a secondary branch of the Government only! If we are indeed thus prostituted, lost, and humbled; if we have ceased to be what the constitution intended, it is time that we should know it. If we are used merely to play the part of the Rump Parliament, yielding up every thing quietly to the will of the Executive, shielding him and his agents in every act, subserving his ambition, and aiding him and his officers to trample down the consecrated barriers of freedom, and to pursue, unchecked, their lawless career, it is time the world should know the infamy that has fallen upon us!

The amendment of the gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. PEARCE] is merely a pretext, made for the purpose of evading a direct vote upon the original resolution; that amendment provides that, if, in the course of events, any cause for a specific charge should exist, then the right of sending for persons and papers shall be given. We do not stand in the situation of a private citizen at issue with a private citizen; we are not bound to make an affidavit, in order to obtain a search warrant; we are not bound to make specific charges, in order to obtain permission for investigation. Each member acts upon this floor in his official capacity, and is responsible before the country. We are the representatives of the people, and, as the source and chief depository of power, we have the right to demand investigation, without assigning specific charges. We have the right to investigate all the offices and papers, (except, perhaps, those that cannot safely be made public, relating to foreign diplomacy,) and archives of the Government, and of all its agents in every department; and this right is essential to maintain the purity of our Government and of our institutions. "But," say the supporters of the administration, "why raise a select committee? Why incur this expense?" I answer, is it not better for them to incur this expense than that they should sit under the suspicion of corrupt conduct? If the investigation should bring nothing to light, will it not then have been better for the Government, by having had this opportunity of showing its purity and establishing its character? Will it not look better to suffer this investigation to take place than to let suspicion spread, by suffering charges of such serious character to pass by unmet and unrepelled?

Mr. P. said he was not one of those demagogues whose mouths are ever pouring forth declarations of their attachment to the people, but I confess I am democrat enough to proclaim our rights in opposition to the insidious encroachments of Government. I avow that I am for the power and the rights of the people being felt practically in this Government, while those who are always declaiming for those rights seem to come here but to smother and suppress them. They profess to be the advocates of the popular cause, while they are all found arrayed in close phalanx on the side of power, pouring out eulogies upon the administration, screening its officers, justifying acts of fraud and corruption, and opposing the people in their demand for inquiry and investigation! Though the party to which I have the honor of belonging has been stigmatized and traduced as the enemy of popular rights, I profess, sir, my attachment to them. I avow undying devotion to the liberties of my country, and I hope yet to live to see the day when the rights of the people, the rights and power of this House, shall no longer be trampled under foot by base subserviency to executive power by those who bow the knee to its mandates, and crowd in eager anxiety to beg the crumbs that fall from the table of a royal master.

Yes, sir, (continued Mr. P.,) I hope to live to see the day when the doctrines we have heard asserted on this floor will be lost and forgotten amid the glory of purer and brighter days—when the representatives of the people shall have their rights and proudly maintain their authority under the constitution—when pilgrims and votaries of liberty from every quarter of the oppressed earth shall gather together here, and bow in reverence before that monument which a free people shall raise, whose noble shaft shall pierce the very heavens, reflecting back, from its broad and radiant surface, the light of everlasting truth and the beams of universal freedom!

Mr. Speaker, (continued Mr. P.,) I cannot refrain from declaring the profound astonishment with which I listened to the extraordinary facts related on this floor by the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. PEXTON,] in relation to the electioneering campaign made by the President last summer through the Western country. We have heard that he has been zealously engaged in the work of securing a successor to his power and authority. We heard of his interference in this matter, of his labors and undignified speeches in the contemptible work of raising into power one who lived by fawning upon his hand. Mortifying and disgusting as these facts are, not less astonishing did it appear to me, when in answer to them we heard the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. GLASCOCK] and the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. RIPLEY] rise in their seats, and, instead of offering apology or denial, exert themselves to justify and vindicate the interference. Sir, I well remember the "Gwinn letter," which indirectly ordered the Ruckerized convention at Baltimore to do the bidding of a master. I knew well that the successor had been appointed, but I did not know, I did not believe, that I should see the day when a representative of a free but betrayed people would rise in his place in this House, and vindicate such appointment.

We are told, in apology for an interference as unconstitutional as it has been undisguised and shameless, that the President has a right to speak his own opinions, "that he is a free man as well as any other citizen," "that he is a man who was never known to hesitate in the frank assertion of his opinion," &c. The private opinion of the President is one thing, the public declaration of his wishes is another. Whenever his opinion, whatever it may be, be it private or be it public, is sustained with all the power and influence of office, is enforced from cabinet ministers down to all the petty holders of office, is proclaimed and preached by menial sycophants and a subsidized press, notoriously under the dictation of power, then, sir, the President's private opinion and preference become a law to a hundred thousand mercenary followers, who live upon his will.

Every people, from their history and education, have a peculiar criterion by which to judge of liberty. In England, an idiot or a knave may sway the sceptre of empire by the law of legitimacy, and the plumes of a titled nobility may wave over stars and garters, and yet the Englishman may proudly claim to be a freeman; and why? Because these things are sustained by the fundamental principles of the British constitution, as part of their authorized and lawful Government. But when Cromwell raised his Government over the ruins of the British constitution, and against the fundamental laws of the empire, although he added to the glory and the power of the British name, yet he was a dictator, and the people were slaves so long as they acquiesced in the usurpation. So it is here. We live in a land of constitutional law, every principle of which sustains the freedom of the elective franchise, from the highest to the lowest. If this great principle of American liberty be violated and defied by executive dictation, no matter what character is raised up as the successor of power under such a dynasty, we are slaves and dastards if we tamely acquiesce. As far as practical liberty is concerned, there is no difference in effect, as to the people interested in the Government of him who comes in, trampling over the freedom of election through dictation, bribery, and fraud, and he who comes into power waving over the desolated fields of his country the bloody sword of a conqueror and usurper. As to all practical effects, they are the same.

Is there any man in this House who does not know that the President elect could not have been chosen but by the direct influence and interference of the President? Let no man say there is no proof of this interference. Independent of the facts stated by my friend from Tennessee, [Mr. PERRY,] and the published letters, toasts, &c., of the President himself, I will now call the attention of this House, and of this country, to some facts upon which I would defy any sworn jury of freemen on earth to bring in a verdict of "not guilty." I will introduce a witness against whom hirelings have poured out their malignity and calumny, but whose veracity and private integrity no man dare impeach. I will give the language of the distinguished Senator from Tennessee, [Judge WHITE,] as it is published in his speech at Knoxville last summer. When the President was on a visit to Tennessee, in the summer of 1834, and "after the rise of the State convention, many members wished to nominate me for the presidency, but abandoned the attempt after they understood that it would incur the President's displeasure. On his journey to Washington, the President conversed freely with some of my friends, and remonstrated against any attempt to nominate me; said there must be a national convention, and Mr. Van Buren ought to be nominated for the presidency, and I for the vice presidency; and, when his eight years were expired, that I was young enough then to be taken up as President." * * * "After I gave my consent to the people to run, and before the meeting of the Baltimore convention, I was repeatedly forewarned what I might expect if my name was not withdrawn," &c.

Such are the unvarnished facts of the case. And who is there bold enough to deny that the President has interfered? Sir, the facts are beyond the possibility of denial, that he has openly interfered, and used his power and authority to nominate his successor, and to do it by bargain and arrangement. Every paltry intrigue and profligate proposition have been used and employed to effect this purpose. The chief offices of the republic have been bartered away, and the President, through the tremendous power and patronage of his position, has called upon a betrayed country to receive its rulers from the hands of a master.

To see the force and bearing of these propositions which the President made, and to show that he fully understood his position and their profligate tendency, I will now refer to a scene in 1825, when his predecessor was chosen by this House. In two letters written by General Jackson, the one dated June 5, 1827, and the other dated July 18, we have the following extraordinary development:

"Early in January, 1825, a member of Congress of high respectability visited me [General Jackson] one morning, and observed that he had a communication he was desirous to make to me; that he was informed there was a great intrigue going on, and that it was right I should be informed of it; [how very kind!] that he came as a friend; and let me receive the communication as I might, the friendly motives through which it was made, he hoped, would prevent any change of friendship or feeling with regard to him. To which I replied, from his high standing as a gentleman and member of Congress, and from his uniform friendly and gentlemanly conduct towards myself, I could not suppose he would make any communication to me which he supposed was improper. Therefore, his motives being pure, let me think as I might of the communication, my feelings towards him would remain unaltered. The gentleman proceeded. He said he had been informed by the friends of Mr. Clay that the friends of Mr. Adams had made overtures to them, saying, if Mr. Clay and his friends would unite in aid of the election of Mr. Adams, Mr. Clay should be Secretary of State. That the friends of Mr. Adams were urging, as a reason to induce the friends of Mr. Clay to accede to their proposition, that, if I was elected President, Mr. Adams would be continued Secretary of State. ['Inuendo, there would be no room for Kentucky.'] That the friends of Mr. Clay stated that the West did not wish to separate from the West; and if I would say, or permit any of my confidential friends to say, that, in case I was elected President, Mr. Adams should not be continued Secretary of State, by a complete union of Mr. Clay and his friends, they would put an end to the presidential contest in one hour. And he was of opinion it was right to fight such intriguers with their own weapons. To which, in substance, I replied, that in politics, as in every thing else, my guide was principle; and, contrary to the expressed and unbiased will of the people, or their constituted agents, I never would step into the presidential chair; and requested him to say to Mr. Clay and his friends,

(for I did suppose he had come from Mr. Clay, though he used the term of Mr. Clay's friends,) that before I would reach the presidential chair by such means of bargain and corruption, I would see the earth open and swallow both Mr. Clay and his friends, and myself with them. This disclosure was made to me by Mr. James Buchanan, a member of Congress from Pennsylvania, a gentleman of the first respectability and intelligence.

"The evening before he had communicated, substantially, the same proposition to Major Eaton, my colleague in the Senate, [How did the General know that?] with a desire, warmly manifested, that he should communicate with me, and ascertain my views on the subject. This he declined doing, suggesting to Mr. Buchanan that he, as well as himself, could converse with me, and ascertain my views on the matter; though, from his knowledge of me, he thought that he could well conjecture my answer—that I would enter into no engagements whatever. To be thus approached by a gentleman of Mr. Buchanan's high character and standing, with an apology proffered at the time for what he was about to remark to me; one who, as I understood, had always to that moment been on familiar and friendly terms with Mr. Clay, assuring me that on certain terms and conditions being assented to on my part, 'then, by a union of Mr. Clay and his friends, they would put an end to the presidential contest in one hour,' what other conclusion or inference was to be made than that he spoke by authority either of Mr. Clay himself, or some of his confidential friends? The character of Mr. Buchanan with me forbids the idea that he was acting on his own responsibility, or that, under any circumstances, he could have been induced to propose an arrangement unless possessed of satisfactory assurances that, if accepted, it would be carried fully into effect. A weak mind would seldom or ever be thus disposed to act—an intelligent one never. Under all the circumstances appearing at the time, I did not resist the impression that Mr. Buchanan had approached me on the cautiously submitted proposition of some authorized person; and, therefore, in giving him my answer, did so, requesting him 'to say to Mr. Clay and his friends,' what that answer had been," &c.

Observe what Mr. Buchanan says in his letter of explanation, August 8, 1827—

"After I had finished, the General [Jackson] declared he had not the least objection to answer my question, that he thought well of Mr. Adams, but had never said or intimated that he would or that he would not appoint him Secretary of State. That these were secrets he would keep to himself; he would conceal them from the very hairs of his head. That if he believed his right hand then knew what his left would do upon the subject of appointments to office, he would cut it off and cast it into the fire. That if ever he should be elected President, it should be without solicitation and without intrigue," &c.

Mr. Speaker, it is not my purpose to expose contradictions, or to defend those against whom these charges were made. But I call up these scenes, that the world may compare the mock sentiments of affected purity then expressed with the conduct and notorious facts of the present day. And I here take occasion to say that, if it be true, as the President states, that he was approached in January, 1825, with such propositions, from a gentleman who declared to him "that he thought it was right to fight such intriguers with their own weapons"—I say if this be true, it proclaims that he who could avow so base and infamous a sentiment was utterly destitute of all true conceptions of private honor or public integrity.

If the President, in 1825, had such a high sense of honor and respect "for the unbiased will of the people" as to refuse to let it be known—not that he would appoint any particular individual, but that he would not appoint a certain gentleman Secretary of State—where was his honor, where was his delicacy, in 1834, when he proposed to Judge White and "his friends" to regulate and control the whole election by a Ruckerized convention, and through "bargain and corruption" to produce acquiescence by offering himself the first office in the republic to one, and reconciling another with the second office? Little did he think that, in 1825, he was uttering denunciations against his own course in 1834; little did he think, when he penned these declarations in 1827, that he was writing epithets to be called up, like burning letters, over his own conduct and character in 1836.

Mr. Speaker, (continued Mr. P.,) it is with great pain and reluctance that I am compelled to speak of these transactions as I feel that I ought. Nothing could induce me to do so at present but the solemn conviction that I believe they are deeply identified with the liberties of this country. I speak of the President as officially connected with the institutions of freedom. I scorn to excuse him, and to hold up his minions and understrappers for responsibility and denunciation. No, sir; I disdain to use moderate language. I shall take his own epithets. I here then charge that the President has wilfully and openly interfered to appoint his successor, and that he has endeavored to accomplish his object by shameless "bargain and corruption." He has succeeded, and, now, standing on the defaced and spurned constitution, waves aloft the unrestrained sceptre of empire over a deceived and betrayed country. Let us be rich and prosperous; let us be happy and free from personal restraint; let us retain all the forms of a republic, yet are we slaves, and history will hold up our infamy and degradation, if we acquiesce and submit to this lawless dictation. Rome still retained the forms of a republic, long after her conquering generals from devastated provinces brought in the plunder of sacked cities to be divided amongst those who were styled "Roman citizens." Her people still nominally elected their tribune, long after the very sources of power had been corrupted and polluted by the bribery and profligacy of captivating chiefs and abandoned demagogues. These tribunes, who were at first elected to defend, as they nobly did, popular rights, afterwards became prostituted, and, although ostensibly appointed still by the people, yet they knew the hand of their master, and prostrated the liberties of their country before his will. They were arranged and appointed beforehand by those who held the power of the republic. We, too, may still boast the forms of a free people, and long preserve them. We have seen the nomination and appointment of a successor to the Chief Executive; we have witnessed the success of that appointment. All the popularity and influence of the President, with his hundred thousand dependants, all the weight, and power, and influence of the Government, in all its vast and extensive ramifications, have been brought to bear upon the appointment of a successor. And I ask, sir, if we confirm, by re-election, this fraudulent appointment, will not posterity say we, too, are free only in name? Our country has been foully deceived; we have been basely deluded by all the arts of "intrigue, bargain, and corruption." Let it not be said that these things are of no importance; that they have no effect upon practical liberty. Look to their consequences in the future. In physics, in morals, and in politics, those causes are at first small which produce the most tremendous effects upon the destiny of man. The collection of a few shillings of ship-money brought the head of a monarch to the block, and changed for a time the Government of Great Britain. Go into the far West, and trace out, if you can, the origin of the vast Mississippi itself; you will find a bubble at the foot of perhaps some name less hill, from which runs a stream, at the ripple of whose waters not a living creature turns aside; but follow it to the valley below, and it swells, and it deepens, and it widens, until the wealth of a nation floats on its surface, and at the angry voice of whose stormy waves the hardy mariner trembles. I need not say that this is a full illustration of the history and progress of political affairs; that from apparently a small beginning the most tremendous results are produced; that one step over the great landmarks of the constitution will lead to the overthrow of all law, to the prostration of liberty, and the abandoned reign of arbitrary power. A drop of water oozing through the dykes of Holland, if unnoticed, would desolate the fairest regions, and spread terror through a ruined country. If now, in the infancy of our Government, the President has it in his power to nominate and appoint his successor, the day is not far distant when we shall live under a power more odious than hereditary monarchy, because it will be exercised under the deceitful name and habiliments of a republic.

We are told that the South is to be "reconciled by the successor falling into Southern principles," and that it is policy to acquiesce in the appointment. Sir, there may be at heart traitors in the South, but it will be treason to the constitution and to the country to submit to the dictation. No! never, never. We have been foully betrayed, and against the principles of the succession we declare uncompromising, unextinguishable war, "war to the knife." It may be that we shall be but few in numbers; it may be that our flag-staff shall be shattered and broken, but we will nail the flag to the gunwale, and conquer or perish under it.

Let not gentlemen suppose that the present state of things is to last forever—let them not suppose that the dominant party of to-day is to be the dominant party of to-morrow—let them not, in the arrogance of power, forever forget right. These things they may not perhaps feel in their day and generation, but their children may live to see the day when they shall curse, in the bitterness and deep anguish of their hearts, the memory of their fathers, for having brought down upon them degradation and ruin. Even Robespierre himself would have paused in his bloody career of ambition, if he could have foreseen that the same guillotine which he raised over the neck of Danton was so soon to be brought down with a just vengeance upon his own. And the Duke of Orleans, unprincipled as he was, when he sat in that infamous assembly which voted the death of Louis XVI, would have trembled with horror, as he gave his vote for the death of his own blood cousin, if he could have known that, under the despotism he was aiding to raise, his property was so soon to be confiscated and his dripping head held up by the executioner to the vengeance of a lawless mob.

How can the South acquiesce under an administration the head of which has admitted that this Government has the constitutional power to abolish slavery in the District of Columbia? I tell gentlemen they will yet be brought to quail and tremble under the tremendous power of this doctrine. We will yet see the lightning flash, and feel the earthquake's heave. The issue will be made, and we must be prepared to meet it like men, or to crave mercy from one who is against us in sentiment and in feeling.

The coming administration has elements of weakness which it will be difficult to recover from. The opposition can never be satisfied with the corrupt and profligate principles under which it has been dictated. Look around and see the strength that is to be put forth. Where is old Massachusetts? There she is, firm as her granite and everlasting hills, ready for another contest. Look to those people on both sides of the Ohio, who have raised their flag over their country's ramparts, and have so nobly defended themselves against the mercenary bands of power; look to those intrepid people, through whose bosom run the waters of the Tennessee and the Cumberland—where are they all? Ready and eager to step forward in the breach that has been made over the barriers thrown around the freedom of the elective franchise. Look to those people on both sides of the Savannah, and where are they? United in feeling and in sentiment, with one banner streaming aloft in the breeze—that banner under which the constitution was made—the banner under which Jefferson fought his way to victory and to fame—the only banner under which this Government can be reformed—the noble banner of free trade and State rights, under which defeat is no disgrace, and victory is redemption and liberty.

We may be defeated, but not conquered; we have yet the undying spirit of freemen. Then let us come to the rally, and the republic may yet be safe.

Mr. P. then concluded by moving the adoption of the original resolution.

Mr. DUNLAP said he regretted the necessity there was for him to occupy the time of the House on this question; but from the remarks that had just fallen from the honorable gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. PICKENS] he felt it a duty he owed to the Executive, as one of the Representatives from Tennessee, to answer some of the remarks of the honorable gentleman, and to correct him as to some of the facts he had stated. The gentleman from South Carolina has charged General Jackson with dictating to the American people who should be his successor, and by bargain, intrigue, and corruption, to have actually made the American people vote for and elect his successor. To prove these premises to be true, the gentleman has referred to a public speech made by an honorable Senator from Tennessee, [Mr. WHITE,] in which the President is charged with having proposed to make the honorable Senator Vice President if he would not run for the presidency. Mr. D. said the gentleman had also referred to the speech of his honorable colleague, [Mr. PEXTON,] made a few days since in this House, in which the President is charged with interfering with the elections in Tennessee, and abusing a portion of the Representatives from that State. Mr. D. said he had it from the mouth of the President that he never made such a proposition as the one mentioned in Mr. White's speech; and that he never said that one of his colleagues [Mr. SHIELDS] was of no account, and that his constituents ought to send some one that was of some account; nor did he ever say that another of his colleagues [Mr. HUNTSMAN] was on the fence, and no one knows which side he will fall. These charges the President pronounces to be false. Now, sir, said Mr. D., if the premises of the gentleman from South Carolina are erroneous, his conclusions must necessarily be so.

Mr. D. said the administration of President Jackson had been more violently attacked than that of any other President. The opposition to it had made charge after charge against it, and no doubt often without knowing whether they were true or false; and they had misrepresented what the President had said about persons who had always supported his administration, to make them his enemies, and thus get them to give publicity to those charges. Mr. D. said he regretted very much that either of his colleagues should have thought it necessary for them to make the charges they did against the Executive. He was the adopted son of Tennessee; he had spent a life, from boyhood to where he now lies on a bed of sickness, in the service of his country; he has often led the sons of Tennessee to victory and glory, and has gained for himself and his favorite Tennessee imperishable renown. Mr. D. said he should have felt that he had done injustice to the President, to his constituents, to his State, and to his country, if he had kept his seat, and had not given the House the information he had.

He said he was a native Tennessean, and proud of the name; that he was at all times ready to defend the character of his State or her sons, for it is the character of the public servant that gives character to the State. In detracting from the character of General Jackson, you detract from the character of the State. Sir, (said Mr. D.) General Jackson has given to the State of Tennessee more character than any of her other citizens. Mr. D. said he knew full well that great efforts had been made to get Tennessee in opposition to the President, but that could never be done. Tennesseans were governed by principle. Although a majority of them differed with the President as to who should be the successor, they were not opposed to him or to his administration. Mr. D. said he was opposed to the election of Mr. Van Buren, and in favor of his colleague, (Mr. White.) He was for him, for his worth and merit, but he was not prepared to take the course of the gentleman from South Carolina, who had declared open and uncompromising war against the next administration. Sir, (said Mr. D.) how does that gentleman know what will be the principles upon which the next President will administer this Government? Mr. Van Buren has been elected by a majority of the States and a majority of the people; and it is to be presumed that he will administer it on the good old republican principle; and if so, he should most unquestionably support his administration. He would not oppose or support any administration but upon principle.

Mr. D. said he would now say a few words to the friends of the administration. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WISZ] had preferred a general charge against the executive officers of this administration, and asked that a committee might be appointed to examine all of them. Mr. D. said he hoped no friends of the administration would shrink from this general investigation. We now had it in our power to silence the slang of the enemies of the administration forever, by letting them go and examine all the offices; and if there have been any frauds or corruptions in any of them, let the brand of infamy be fixed on them, and let the country and all future administrations know they are unworthy to be trusted. We know, (said Mr. D.) and the American people know, that it is impossible for the President to know all the persons he has to appoint to office, and that he has to depend on his friends for information, and, in some instances, he may have been imposed on, and unworthy men recommended to him. If there be any such, let them be hunted out, and their crimes made known to this House and the whole American people. Mr. D. said, if any amendment should be adopted, it would give the enemies of the administration an opportunity of saying they were limited in their inquiries, and that the administration was afraid of a general investigation. As one of the friends of the administration, (Mr. D. said,) he was for the broadest inquiry, and he would vote for the inquiry in the way they desired it, that there should be no excuse that they were limited.

Mr. PEYTON said: Since my colleague has volunteered his services, and come upon the stand to give evidence against me, the direct tendency of which is to attack my veracity, although he seems to evade that, I claim the right to examine the witness. I mean, sir, to examine him upon his voir dire, and require him to speak the whole truth. This seeming extraordinary sensitiveness of the gentleman, the mock sympathy in the loud appeals which he has just exhibited, the pretended necessity of defending the President, are the usual evidences which I have observed to accompany a Van Buren conversion. Yes, sir, and I am not at all surprised to witness it in my colleague. I thought I had seen strong premonitory symptoms of this before. I had never known a deserter leave our ranks but what he went over hallooing glory, glory to General Jackson. He says that he has differed with General Jackson as to the succession. I do not know, sir; I think, if that gentleman differed with the President at all, the difference was not worth naming. I looked with anxiety for friends to Mr. White every where through our State, and I never was able to put my finger on that gentleman's services. But, sir, I understand the gentleman as giving in his adhesion now, and as pledging himself in advance to the support of the new administration. He wishes to know if any man who possesses the feelings of patriotism can oppose the measures of that administration before he knows what they are. Sir, as to principles and measures, I shall be found ever supporting the same that I have done heretofore. I shall not turn from my course, and leave my principles, because they may or may not be advocated and sustained by any President. But, sir, I never will ratify the deed of succession. I never will countenance an act which makes the nomination of a successor a cabinet measure, and issues in advance a veto on the ballot-box. But, sir, my object in rising was to notice the evidence of the gentleman, and to get a little more out of him, if possible. He professes ignorance of that which was known to every body else in Tennessee, and, to strengthen his ignorance, he says that the President authorized him to come here and make the denial which he has made. Now, in the first place, I wish to know of the gentleman when this denial was made; was it since the beginning of the present session of Congress? I wish the gentleman to say when.

[Mr. DUNLAP rose, and said he did not intend to be catechised in this style by his colleague, [Mr. PEYTON;] but as to the time when the President made the denial to him, he (Mr. D.) was not unwilling to give his colleague whatever information he might desire. He would, therefore, say that he (Mr. D.) had not seen the President from July last until December; he had never had any conversation with the President in relation to the tales circulated in Tennessee until after his colleague (Mr. P.) had made his late speech on the resolution now before the House. In reference to this speech, and the speech made by the Senator from Tennessee, [Mr. WHITE,] the President made the denial which he had repeated.]

Mr. PEYTON resumed. Just as I expected, Mr. Speaker. The evidence has been extracted at this session of Congress, since I made a speech, to be used upon this occasion. Is it not extraordinary, while the gentleman is bellowing so pathetically, thundering his sympathy into the very stones of the Capitol, about the poor sick President, the dying President, that he should convict himself of tormenting and harassing him on such subjects? But, sir, this shows that what I have often said is the fact—that nothing transpires here but it is immediately hissed into the ears of the President by some eaves-dropper, some penny-post carrier of news, from this hall. Sir, they know the President's excitability; they know how to extract from his excited feelings denunciations broad, denials, general and special, of whatever was said, especially in the shape in which they present it before him; and then they run forth, proclaiming to the world that they are authorized by the old Hero to denounce and convict the object of their attack of falsehood. The gentleman says he will not be catechised by me. How dare he then volunteer himself as a witness here against me? No, sir, he cannot stand up and answer me; if he were, I would make him acknowledge that the President did not deny what I stated to be true. At what has the gentleman taken fire? At the charge that the President was highly excited in Tennessee, and took an active part in favor of Mr. Van Buren while there? Yes, sir, and he professes to bear a commission from the President himself, which will destroy all that I stated on the subject. Does he pretend that the President of the United States of America authorized him to deny what I related as having taken place at Jonesborough, in relation to his defence of Reuben Whitney?

[Here Mr. DUNLAP inquired whether his colleague wished him to answer him.]

Mr. PEXTON. No, sir, not yet. I wish the gentleman to take it not in broken doses, but all together, and may be it will operate the better. I know the President made no such denial, because that exhibition was published in the Van Buren press of Jonesborough. Secondly, did he commission the gentleman to come here and deny that he charged me with opposing the appropriation to the Cherokee treaty? I know not, sir, what strongly operating cause has induced this evidence, now volunteered in this hall. But, sir, I know that no man can get the President to forget or deny that. Thirdly, did the President deny that he charged the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WISE] with being a liar, at Sparta, Tennessee? Fourthly, did he deny saying of the able, manly, and lucid speech of my colleague, [Mr. FORRESTER], at the same place, that any one could get such a speech written at Washington for five dollars? Fifthly, did he deny saying at Mrs. Saunders's, in Sumner county, Tennessee, that my colleague [Colonel BELL] told twenty lies in one speech, and knew them to be lies at the time, and that I was a greater liar than Bell? No, sir, the gentleman will not, he dare not, say that the President denied one of these five specifications, going to show his interference in the election while he was in Tennessee. Then the gentleman has not, I perceive, got a carte blanche from the President to deny any thing and every thing which he may think necessary. If he denies any thing which I have said upon the authority of the President, I demand that he produce a witness, and prove that the President told him so. It is not surprising that the President should have forgotten a part of what took place in Tennessee. I wish he could forget all these things—all that transpired while he was in Tennessee. I envy him not his office who will run to the President, harass him with goading reflections, and then draw forth the hasty declarations of an exasperated man, to be used for a hidden purpose. This is unaccountable, unless it is necessary to bolster up a political sunset, about to be cut in the face of a frowning and indignant constituency. Such a manoeuvre could not, perhaps, be safely made without the benefit of the President's name to give it sanction. But, sir, I would always prefer a bold, open, honest, opponent to a spy in the camp. These doubtful, hesitating, news-carrying men are not fit for these times, and the sooner they make an open desertion the better. Now is the time for men to come upon the stage, and act their parts; high-minded men, who love liberty more than they do gold; who love office less than they do honor. Such a man, in a good cause, has nothing to fear. My colleague, [Mr. DUNLAP], it would seem, only wished an opportunity of manifesting his zeal by filling the honorable office of trumpeter, to announce the President's denial in this House. I am sorry to see the gentleman fixing his fancy upon office, and then make his first appearance in such an office as this. If the gentleman was offended with my remarks, why go to the President? Why not meet me? Why drag the President in, and attempt to force an issue between him and myself? Why say that the President denied the whole, and then say he will not be catechised by me? I say that the President has not denied the whole; he has only denied, according to the gentleman's own admission, when he rose to answer my questions, two specifications out of seven; and the charge of interference is as fully made out by those five undenied and undeniable specifications, as it would be by seven, or seventy. And yet the gentleman says he is authorized to contradict the whole charge as false. Now, sir, with all the gentleman's professed feelings of regard for Mr. White, he has never had his sensitiveness shocked into his defence upon this floor. Oh, no; he has been unmoved while deluges of calumny have been poured upon him from the press; and the batteries of executive denunciation have been levelled at him from the day of his announcement as a candidate for the presidency. And now this same dumb supporter of his is running to the President for evidence to assail him as the propagator of falsehood. He a friend of Mr. White! When and how has he shown it? I think it is time for these insidious assaults upon that venerable man to cease. All his assailants tree themselves behind the President before they take their aim at him. But he is armed too strong in honesty. They have not the power to tarnish his name. In reference to the coming administration, my colleague seems to be quite in a rage that any one should think of any thing but passive obedience and non-resistance to it; he speaks loudly of pure measures, not yet known or understood, and therefore not to be opposed. I myself will support all that is pure in that pure administration. It is a sorry dynasty, to be sure. But, sir, the man himself is "tainted with original sin," as was once said by a voice (I wish it was now animate and here) now stilled and gone, (John Randolph's,) and the people have a right to demand an atonement to their offended majesty. To succeed in his ambitious views, he has struck a deadly blow at the ballot-box; he has broken down the sacred guarantees of liberty; he has transferred the sovereign power from the people to the President, which President he is. And is he not answerable for this? Are not these principles incompatible with freedom? What atonement can he make but to give back into the hands of the people their violated rights, their lost privileges, their ancient sovereignty and freedom of elections? Nothing but full and complete restoration; nothing short of the entire razing to its foundation his caucus system, his executive patronage system, his bribery system, his whole New York system, will ever be an atonement for what he has already done.

The gentleman speaks of those pure measures which are yet to come, as though they would sanctify all that is past. Can he, can any man, do as much public good in four years, ay, in a lifetime, as he has done harm, in the manner, the means by which he has ascended to power? Is he to say to the American people, "I will make you an excellent master; here is a new blanket, and I shall now expect that you behave like good, obedient slaves?" No murmuring, no clamor about who is master, though, as that would be factious. Sir, look at his system, and see to what it has already brought the country. Has he not directly or indirectly tempted every man in the country who is looked upon as in his way? Sir, the very man who is so insidiously struck at by the gentleman (Mr. White) was approached, and I know it. It is true that the bribe was not offered directly, and was offensive to him. The proposition was made to his friends in the mildest form, and the smoothest and most coaxing tones. "Now, is it not better to adjust this matter? Would not Mr. White be satisfied with the vice presidency? Would he not like to retire to a seat on the supreme bench—a station for which he is so well qualified—with so handsome a salary, and that for life too?" No, sir! all your offices and all your money would not shake the firmness or tempt the virtue of that man. But, sir, all men are not armed so strong in honesty—all men are not steeled with his Roman firmness against such temptations. That office was bestowed, upon what conditions I will not say, upon another. And, sir, the third office in the Government, the chair which you occupy, was, in the same persuasive, coaxing manner, offered to my friend and colleague, [Mr. BELT,] upon condition that he would sell himself, abandon friends whom he loved, principles which he believed were identified with the dearest interest of his country, and join a party in whose principles and political honesty he had no confidence. But, no, sir, he spurned it! All men are not so strongly fortified against temptations as he was. And now those who have never had office, who would not accept it on the only terms upon which office is bestowed in these days, are traitors who are looking solely to self-aggrandizement, while they who have sold themselves for those places which they fill before our eyes are the pure, unstained patriots!

My colleague pretends great love for Mr. White. Why, then, has he never raised that voice which we have so distinctly heard here to-day, in his defence?

But, sir, my only purpose in rising was to put my colleague on his answer; he, however, has declined answering my questions, and I therefore charge him with admitting all that I have stated to be true. As to any part of what I stated having been forgotten, or denied by the President, it will not be considered remarkable by any one that he should have forgotten any particular transaction or remark, when they know that so treacherous was his memory, that, notwithstanding the proof positive, the Globe itself, was laid before him at Knoxville, showing his mistake in relation to my course on the Cherokee appropriation, yet, ten miles further on his road, he repeated the same charge. And now, sir, these gentlemen go to him on his dying bed, as they say, feeble and worn down by disease, and extract evidence from him of what passed in Tennessee, and bring it here to be used against those who did not, and who will not, obey orders with regard to the successor. Such statements do not satisfy me: I demand a witness to the conversation; I want proof of what the President does and what he does not deny.

Mr. DUNLAP said he had but performed a duty in saying what he had, and, if he had not done it, he would have been unworthy to be the Representative of the thirteenth congressional district in Tennessee; that he performed his duty without regard of consequences to himself. He did not conceive that his colleague had any right to complain of his course, as he was but answering charges that had been made against the President; and if they were untrue, his colleague should have been gratified to learn that the President was not guilty of the charges that had been imputed to him. Mr. D. said that his colleague [Mr. PEXTON] had not given his statement of what the President should have said as being made to him, but to others, and by them communicated to him. Mr. D. said it was but due to his two colleagues [Messrs. SHIELDS and HUNTSMAN] that he should have made the statement he did. Mr. D. said he had called to see the President in his sick room, and the President spoke to him of the charges his enemies had made against him, and the efforts they were making to alienate his friends from him, and then mentioned what my colleague had charged him with saying about my other two colleagues, and the President said he had never made use of any such expressions about either of them; that the statement was false. Mr. D. said the gentleman from South Carolina had taken the facts stated by my colleague as undeniably true; and if he had remained silent, and let the speech of the gentleman have gone to the country as true, he would have been guilty of a dereliction of duty, not only to the Executive, but to his country, for which his constituents would never have forgiven him. Mr. D. said he had done his duty, and would do it again under similar circumstances, disregarding the consequences to himself.

Mr. ROBERTSON then obtained the floor; and the House adjourned without taking any question.

DISTRIBUTION OF THE PUBLIC LANDS.

Mr. C. ALLAN offered the following preamble and resolution:

Whereas Congress has heretofore made donations of the public lands for the purpose of internal improvement and education—

To the State of Ohio,	-	-	1,737,838 acres.
Indiana,	-	-	1,012,592
Illinois,	-	-	1,712,215
Missouri,	-	-	1,181,248
Mississippi,	-	-	733,244
Alabama,	-	-	1,216,450
Louisiana,	-	-	920,053
Territory of Michigan,	-	-	599,973
Arkansas,	-	-	996,338
Florida,	-	-	947,724

in the aggregate amounting to eleven million fifty-seven thousand six hundred and eighty-five acres:

And whereas each of the United States has an equal right to participate in the benefit of the public lands, the common property of the Union;

And every wise and good American having agreed in the opinion that the cause of general education is indissolubly identified with the cause of general liberty:

Therefore, to do equal and exact justice to all the States, to aid in diffusing among the rising generation intelligence enough to comprehend and spirit enough to defend their rights, and thus to elevate the national character and insure the perpetuity of our free institutions—

Be it resolved, That a select committee of one member from each State be appointed, whose duty it shall be to inquire into the justice and expediency of making to each of the thirteen original American States, together with each of the States of Vermont, Maine, Kentucky, and Tennessee, such grants of the public lands, for the purposes of education, as will correspond in a just proportion with those heretofore made in favor of the first-named States and Territories, and that said committee have leave to report by bill or otherwise. But, to avoid the objection of one State holding land in another, the committee is directed to insert a clause in the bill which they may report, providing that the grants to be made thereby shall be subject to sale under the laws of the General Government now in force, and that the proceeds arising therefrom shall be paid over to the States entitled to the same.

Mr. HALL, of Maine, moved to amend the resolution by striking out the words "select committee, to consist of one member from each State," and insert "the Committee on Public Lands."

Mr. C. ALLAN said he hoped the amendment would not prevail, because it would be perceived that the duty imposed on the committee was one which did not properly fall within the class of duties assigned to the Committee on Public Lands. But there was another reason. That committee, he believed, consisted of a majority of members from the new States, in whose favor these grants had heretofore been made. He submitted to the justice and impartiality of the House whether it was fair to submit a proposition which had for its object to do equal and exact justice to the twenty-six American States, to a committee composed of a majority of members from the new States. He (Mr. A.) had rejoiced that these grants had been made to the new States; and it was not from any want of friendship to the new States that he opposed the amendment. Mr. A. said he did not distrust the impartiality or ability of the Committee on Public Lands; but as the subject was one in which all the States were deeply and vitally interested, he thought it should go to such a committee as he had proposed.

Mr. HALL withdrew his motion.

Mr. DAVIS said he did not rise to discuss the question, as it would be premature at this stage of the proceedings; but he rose to express his astonishment at the proposition submitted by the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. ALLAN.] Sir, said Mr. D., the proposition is one carrying with it palpable and gross injustice to the new States. To prove this fact, it is but necessary to refer to the ratio by which the surplus revenue is distributed; in addition to the thousands and millions expended in the old States upon fortifications, ships of war, custom-houses, and a thousand other public works, they receive, by the bill of the last session, a very large amount over and above what their population would entitle them to; take for example, said Mr. D., those States whose representation on this floor would not be sustained, if the ratio of 1830 was now applied; and yet at this very moment the State of Indiana, under the same ratio, is entitled to fifteen or sixteen Representatives; and yet, forsooth, the gentleman is desirous that the old States shall have the power to put their fingers into the Treasury, and take therefrom an additional quantum of that revenue which is principally acquired by the labor and enterprise of the new States.

Mr. D. had hoped better things from the gentleman; he had hoped that the gentleman's knowledge of the privations incident to the settlement of the new States would not have urged him to impose this additional requirement upon a people already most unjustly taxed. Sir, said Mr. D., if the old States possess the power thus to infringe upon the rights of the West, to wring from that oppressed portion of your country the proceeds of their labor, and are determined to carry out the principle of such unjust exactions, I shall not be surprised soon to see our private lands, if not our personal property, made the source of additional revenue, for the benefit of the old States.

The gentleman has appealed to the justice and magnanimity of the members of the new States in submitting this proposition. Sir, said Mr. D., that word justice is entirely a relative term; and if his proposition carries with it justice in his estimation, it is the farthest imaginable from being justice in my view of the subject. Sir, the old States, jointly, have already been ruling us with a rod of iron upon this subject, and we have little hope that our condition would be bettered by their disjointed control. I ardently hope that the proposition may not obtain even a reference. For my own part, I am prepared to vote against it now and to all future time. Mr. D. concluded by moving to lay the proposition on the table; but withdrew it at the request of

Mr. VINTON, who moved to amend the resolution by adding thereto the following:

Resolved, That said committee be further instructed to inquire into the expediency of inserting a clause in said bill to pay said new States the value of the improvements made by them on the public lands, or to pay to them the amount the public lands would have been assessed for taxes, if they had been private property.

Mr. V. said he should interpose no objection to making the inquiry proposed by the resolution; but, as one of the Representatives of one of the States excepted from the benefit of the resolution, he could not consent that the impression should exist, here or elsewhere, (which the resolution was calculated to make,) that the grants of land made to those States were gratuities.

The resolution is predicated upon the assumption that such is the character of those grants, and that, on the principles of distributive justice, the other States ought to receive equivalent grants, in which the new States should not participate. Those cessions of land were not donations; but they were grants made, for the most part, under compacts with those States, in which the United States obtained a full equivalent, and, in some cases, perhaps more than a fair equivalent. The State of Ohio, at the time of her admission into the Union, obtained by compact with the United States a portion of the public lands within her territory for the support of schools, and a portion of the proceeds of the sale of those lands for internal improvements; and, in consideration thereof, the State of Ohio obligated herself to forego taxation upon those lands while they remained the property of the United States, and for five years after sale; thus throwing the support of the State Government, and the heavy burden of making roads through the public lands, upon the proprietors of private property. One fact is perfectly conclusive against the idea that these grants to that State were regarded by either party as a donation. The act of Congress authorizing that State to call a convention and form a State constitution proposed to the convention certain grants as a compensation for the surrender by the State of the taxing power over the public lands for five years after sale. The convention rejected the proposition of Congress, and proposed, as the condition of this surrender, other and greater grants by Congress; which proposition of the convention was subsequently accepted by act of Congress. The compact made with Ohio led the way for the compacts with the other new States since admitted, and, in most of them, has been the basis of their arrangements with the United States. Let me advert to the practical operation of this arrangement. When these States were admitted, perhaps nine tenths of the public land in each of them remained to be sold. Roads must be made in the country, almost wholly a wilderness, from settlement to settlement; and in the establishment of a new road, in most cases by far the greater part of it would pass over the land of the Government. Under this arrangement, the land of the public contributed nothing; the whole expense was borne by taxation of private property, the proprietors of which were thus placed under the necessity of making roads not only through their own lands, but through the lands of the public also. The money thus expended in making roads through the public lands gave them an immediate value, so soon as the road was opened, which they did not possess before, and was almost always sure to make a ready market for them. In making these improvements, the citizens of the State have been subjected to very heavy and oppressive taxation. These are the burdens the people of the new States have imposed on themselves, and these are the benefits the United States have derived from these burdens, no part of which, as the great landed proprietary of the country, have they borne. If the proposition of the gentleman from Kentucky prevail, have not the new States a right to insist that Kentucky and the other States who are thus placed on a footing with them shall give an equivalent for it equal to that which they themselves have paid? With what truth or justice can it be said that grants made by you, to purchase an exemption from taxation, which imposed on the grantees the necessity of improving your property free of charge to you, and from which you have derived great benefit, was a mere gratuity and favor to the grantees? Again, I ask, if other States come in for the grants, should they not also get them by compact and upon payment of a like or equal consideration?

The United States, sir, have been gainers by all the grants they have made to the new States. They have been made on the principle of advancing their own interest, as the great land proprietor of the country. In illustration of their policy and operation, the grants made to the State of Ohio, to aid in constructing her canals between Lake Erie and the Ohio, may be cited as examples. Upon the line of what we call our Lake Erie and Ohio canal, there was a considerable quantity of land remaining unsold. It had been in market twenty or thirty years; was considered refuse land, and might not, without this improvement, have found a purchaser for another quarter of a century. You made a grant of land to aid in the construction of the work, and when the State had decided on executing it, your refuse lands were purchased up almost in a day. With what justice can you claim the right to profit by the labor, the enterprise, and the capital of others, and contribute nothing yourself? Will similar grants to the old States enhance the value of the public domain? But, sir, in making this grant to the State of Ohio, you did not content yourself with taking the advance of your property as a compensation for what was given. You did more, sir; you imposed upon the State a perpetual obligation to transport upon her canals, free of tolls, in all time to come, the troops, provisions, munitions of war, and other property of the United States.

This is a privilege which the United States will always have some occasion to use in time of peace; but, in the event of a war with Great Britain, the geographical relation of those canals to what must be the great theatre of the war would render this privilege of incalculable value to the United States, who, without it, would pay tolls by thousands upon tens of thousands. What equivalent privilege will the old States confer on the United States for a similar grant? And, if they give none, then, in all fairness, ought not the State of Ohio to be exonerated from this onerous obligation?

To the other great line of canal from the Ohio, at Cincinnati, to the Maumee bay, on Lake Erie, you made a grant in a somewhat different form, but the same in object and principle; that is to say, to advance your own interest. This canal, for a great portion of its distance, runs through what was then a solitary wilderness, remote from settlement. It was in market, but could find no purchasers at a dollar and a quarter. Before even the State had passed a law to make a canal through this wilderness, you made to the State a conditional grant of the alternate section for five miles on each side of the route of the canal, as far as the Government owned the land, on condition the State would make the work in a specified length of time, and would grant to the United States a perpetual exemption of all toll on the whole line of the canal. But you did not stop here. You withdrew the other alternate section from market, and declared it should be exposed again at public auction, and that it should not be sold either at public or private sale for less than two dollars and fifty cents per acre; thus providing that, in any event, the half reserved should not be sold for less money than you were before offering the whole at, and, at the same time, securing to yourself the chance of a speculation even beyond that at the auction sale. Allured by this proposition, the State has undertaken to make that canal, and, in consequence of it, those lands, at a moderate estimate, will bring to the Government, on an average, from six to ten dollars per acre. You have made a bargain with the State that is a good speculation, and will give you double the money you would otherwise have realized from the whole of your property.

Now, sir, this grant to the State of Ohio lays no just foundation for a claim to grants to the elder States of the Union. The grants to Indiana, Illinois, and to the other new States, were made upon similar considerations, and their history is substantially the same as that of the State of Ohio. If, therefore, grants are to be made to the old States, for education and internal improvements, to which I have no objection, I shall claim, as one of the representatives of the new States, similar grants for them also. I cannot consent that they shall be excluded. I have been prompted to say what I have now said, that an impression might not obtain any where, even for a moment, that for the grants made to the new States the United States have not received the benefit of a full and fair consideration.

Mr. C. ALLAN replied briefly to the remarks of Mr. VINTON, and expressed his belief that when the subject came to be thoroughly examined, it would be found that all the reasons which had been given for granting lands to the new States, in preference to the old, would be found sophistical. He wished for the opportunity to make the investigation; and if the committee were unable to satisfy the nation that the measure was just, let it be put down. He regretted, however, to see the members from the new States opposing the inquiry.

Mr. VINTON said he had not objected to the inquiry itself, but had, on the contrary, expressly avowed himself favorable to it, if the new States were embraced.

Mr. C. ALLAN said that if it should be found that the new States were entitled to any special privileges, he was willing to allow them. But he wished first to have the report of a committee, and he would then reply in full to the argument of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. VINTON.]

Mr. BRIGGS expressed astonishment at the opposition the resolution had received, and at the alarm which a mere proposition for inquiry seemed to have raised in the minds of the gentlemen from Ohio, [Mr. VINTON,] and Indiana, [Mr. DAVIS.] The internal improvements which had been referred to had been made for the benefit of the people residing in those States, and they had no cause of complaint because they could not make the Government pay for them. The proposition was one of justice and of right, and he hoped this House would adopt it.

Mr. PARKER was surprised that a proposition involving the rights of the people of this Union, and not inconsistent with the rights of any portion of them, should have created so much sensation. He thanked the gentleman from Kentucky for the introduction of the resolution. Was it any injustice to the new States, who have received these lands, to inquire into the expediency of extending the grants to the States to which they had not heretofore been extended? The public lands were the common property of the people of the United States, and were supposed to be applied for the common benefit of all.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Louisiana, contended that these grants to the new States had been made as a consideration for exemption from taxation of the public lands lying within these States for the term of five years. He had no objection to the resolution going to a committee, but he thought that, in its present form, it was directed only to a partial inquiry; and he moved to amend it by extending the provisions of the resolutions to all the States of the Union.

Mr. C. ALLAN accepted the modification.

Mr. CLAIBORNE, of Mississippi, moved to amend the amendment by adding as follows:

"And provided that no such grant shall interfere with, or be located on, the claim or improvement of any actual settler on the public lands."

In support of this amendment, Mr. C. said, it was no longer to be disguised—and however other gentlemen might feel, there was nothing more humiliating or painful to him—that the applications of the settlers on the public domain were too often received with indifference, almost amounting to contempt. Every day, sir, we see and feel on this floor the deleterious influence of sectional prejudice and power. Let an application come here from any other quarter for relief, for suffering by fire, for pensions, for erecting custom houses, and improving harbors; let a gentleman from Maryland [Mr. JENIFER] present on one day, from one worn-out district, thirty petitions for obsolete claims; or let gentlemen from Kentucky ask for heavy appropriations to construct turnpikes at Maysville, and canals at Louisville; let a demand come here for damages in any shape, and a powerful organized interest springs up to support it. But when a whole community of men in the West—the bone and muscle of the country—come forward and ask leave to secure the homes wrought out of the wilderness by their own hands, you not only refuse their prayer—not only add insult to injury—but there are those here, and in the other branch of Congress, who sneer at their sufferings, and ridicule their condition.

Sir, it is fit that this should end. The time has come—long indeed in its approach, but is here at length—when the representatives of this injured class of the American people are required by them to take a decided stand. However gentlemen, nursed on the lap of luxury, and accustomed to the refinements of metropolitan life, may feel, the time has come when we shall at least demand some reparation of our wrongs. It is well known that there are in this House contending interests; there are at this very session questions of grave importance to every section of the Union to be arranged; and in the balancing of these interests, and the adjustment of these questions, the settlers on the public lands must not be forgotten. For myself, though the humblest representative of that great interest, I freely avow that I shall reluctantly vote one dollar of the public money for any purpose whatever, until some measures have been adopted for those whose strong and pressing claims have been too long postponed. Your custom-houses may remain unbuilt; your magnificent harbors be unimproved; your princely merchants may complain of duties; your Patent Office never rise from its mouldering bed; but, so far as my estimate of right and wrong will sustain me, I will question the propriety of any appropriation, unless some relief be extended to us.

Sir, I make a sincere and solemn appeal to my political friends in this House, where it is well known we have a controlling majority. If there be any class of men who have supported their measures; who have made exertions and sacrifices for the democratic cause; who have adhered to their principles, and to this administration, unseduced and untimid by the wealth, and talent, and power, of the opposition; who have stood firm amid successive panics, and even under the effects of the late uncalled for Treasury order have ascribed to those from whom it emanated none but patriotic motives; if there be any such, it is the settlers on the public domain. Mr. Speaker, the State of Mississippi has recently voted for Mr. Van Buren, a gentleman not personally known to fifty of its citizens, against a distinguished neighbor (Judge White) well known to two thirds of our population. We voted for Mr. Van Buren because we had full confidence in his ability, patriotism, and freedom from all geographical prejudices; because we believed, from the whole tenor of his public life, he would pursue a liberal and just course in relation to the public lands; and that, in such event, his high and elevated character, and the general trust reposed by the people in his views, would enable him more effectually than either of his competitors to promote our great object, the reduction of the price of public lands, or something equivalent thereto. We preferred Mr. Van Buren because he might be favorably compared with either of his opponents for talents and public services; because one of them (Mr. Webster) was decidedly unfriendly to titles founded upon occupancy and cultivation; because another (General Harrison) was in favor of applying the proceeds of the public land to the emancipation and colonization of our slaves; and because the great mass of the friends of the other (Judge White) had uniformly opposed every effort to obtain a system of pre-emption and graduation laws. I recognise no stronger opponents of these salutary measures than the friends of Judge White in Maryland, Virginia, Georgia, and the Carolinas. These, sir, are some of the reasons that established our preference for Mr. Van Buren; reasons as disinterested as ever operated upon any other community, and not, as the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. ROBERTSON] would insinuate, mercenary and selfish in their character.

Mr. Speaker, mine is not the language of menace or disrespect. I speak in the spirit of confidence, of abiding confidence, in the majority, and with a frankness not often addressed to men in power. We have long submitted to injustice; we have acquiesced, time after time, and administration after administration, in the necessity that seemed to compel a postponement of our rights; and now, when every political consideration warrants a speedy redress, when the party always professing to be friendly to our cause have majorities in both Houses of Congress; professions, too, that have enabled us for years to sustain ourselves; I repeat, sir, that we have good reason to expect relief.

Sir, I have frequently heard gentlemen declaim in this hall of our glorious Union. Let me tell them, if they desire to preserve it, they must no longer spurn at the cries of complaint and injustice coming from the West. The voice of whole communities cannot be stifled in peace. If a single State, one that exhibited in the war of the Revolution the brightest examples of patriotism and gallantry, maddened under the unconstitutional exactions made upon the South, and shook this confederacy to its centre, what must be the moral effect of your treatment to the Western States; of a contemptuous rejection of the prayers of their respective Legislatures; of an avaricious and fraudulent policy? Sir, you have done more to cripple the energies and to damp the affections of the great multitude, the men who move in masses, and make revolutions, than you ever did to provoke South Carolina. Sir, sir, it is worse than a thousand tariffs.

* Mr. Speaker, the policy of reduction and of the pre-emption system is so much cherished throughout the broad region irrigated by the Mississippi and its tributaries, that any refusal to act on the subject at this juncture would produce a feeling of alarm and discontent. Guard the public domain with the closest restrictions, to prevent fraud and deceptive speculations; watch it with the vigilance of a duenna, but do not deprive the poor man of his home, the emigrant of his stimulus, the new States of that which serves as a salutary drain for your crowded and suffering population. It may be fashionable to denounce these modifications of our land laws as opening avenues to fraud. I believe they have essentially contributed to develop the resources of our country. They have created States in the distant West, stocked them with men who were foremost in your battles on the frozen wastes of Canada, and who now, in the same spirit, are baptizing with their blood the star-gemmed banner of a maiden empire. Sir, I never think of these men, of their sacrifices and privations, without regretting that the great man [Mr. CLAY] sent here to represent the West, whose voice was heard during the darkest hours of the late war, cheering on his country, should now be found, still trumpet-tongued, pleading, not for his once-loved pioneers, but for the right of this Government to deprive them of their homes!

Mr. Speaker, it may well be questioned whether you can equitably withhold these privileges from the occupants. This Government has assuredly held out the presumption that liberal changes in the existing laws would be made. Our present Executive certainly went into power and has sustained his administration as much on this principle as on any other. Inducements have been held out to the people to emigrate to the waste lands; promises have been made to them year after year; and would it not be a species of fraud to say they are trespassers, and must be driven off? And driven where, sir? From your own free country into a foreign clime.

If you give them an inchoate title, and allow them to take possession; if, after having cut down your forests, opened roads, improved rivers, and built up villages, you eject them, without trial, or compensation, or sympathy, houseless wanderers over a soil created for their benefit and enriched by their industry, would not the whole world denounce it as an act of heartless cruelty? Sir, let me warn the House to beware of the consequence that may follow this parsimonious policy. The people of this country are not blind. All our acts are scrutinized and canvassed by the poorest settler in the back woods. If they should discover partial legislation, our statute books teeming with laws that operate to the benefit of one portion of society at the expense of another, relieving wealthy merchants, endowing colleges where a poor boy never enters; supporting, at a great expense, a military institution monopolized by the influential, and conferring extravagant salaries on men who manage cotillions better than armies; should they see all this, and compare it with the little that has been done for them, the great mass, what must be the consequence? Why, sir, a feeling of discontent that may be dangerous in time to come. In despotic Governments the disaffection of the people is comparatively unimportant; it can be put down with edicts, and censorships, and arms; but here, the multitude is free; no chains are worn, nor badges of servitude; there are equal privileges, fundamental rights, which we dare not violate; public opinion, if it has not the sanctity and legality of Government, has more than its power. You cannot put this down, Mr. Speaker, by any act of Congress; but you can force upon the people a feeling of agrarianism, a jealousy of property, a disposition hostile to chartered rights. There is a tendency to this in all mankind. Without venturing into political economy, we may divide society into two classes—producers and non-producers. The first constitute the majority, but three fourths of their labor goes to enrich the latter. The few become rich, the many remain poor, under the contributions levied upon them by the former, who, in all ages of the world, have more or less held the law-making power in their hands. But still the mass have the strength, and the bone, and the muscle; and, when roused to exertion, by a long denial of justice, or by years of oppressive legislation, their retribution is terrible. Sir, history is full, alas, too full, of illustrations. There are a hundred volumes in your library crimsoned with the story of popular vengeance. Turn to those tomes of human vice and folly, and trace through their dusty pages the course of every revolution, from the earliest records of time, and it will be found that however postponed or aggravated by other causes, they always commenced with some unregarded disaffection of the people. Mr. Speaker, the agrarian spirit is very dangerous; it is spreading in England, throughout Europe, and every man, with his eyes open, must perceive its progress in the United States. For the last ten years, fostered by unequal laws and high tariff duties, it has spread widely and deeply, particularly in your large cities and manufacturing towns, where the inequalities of wealth, the artificial distinctions of society, and the contrasts of plenty and privation, are painfully visible. This is certainly the weak point in our Government. It is not disunion or foreign aggression, or extended empire or centralism, but this very community principle, which we may dread. In a republic it must inevitably be produced by partial and oppressive legislation. It can only be arrested by conferring equal benefits on all. Sir, the inequality of our legislation is felt by every laboring man in the West, in reference to his great object of interest, the public lands.

He knows practically that your system of disposing of them, especially now, when the mania of speculation rages, is by no means equitable. They are run out by surveyors, who note every valuable lot, and sell the information thus acquired to speculators. They are then put up at auction to the highest bidder. Can the settler come in competition with the opulent planter or associated capital? Can he purchase at ten or twenty dollars per acre? No, sir, no. Deceived by his Government, cheated by the deceitful illusion, not broken until the last hour, that some reservation authorized by law would be made in his favor, the care-worn occupant returns, with a bitter and rebellious spirit, to witness the disappointment and wretchedness of his own fire-side; his children desponding; his wife perhaps in the agony of childbed, shelterless; himself, decrepit and penniless, driven forth by the influence of wealth and the ingratitude of his country. Oh, sir, it is unwise thus to sport with the affections of your people; it is hard thus to deprive one of his home, humble though it be. Sprung from the earth, and destined to return to it, every man wishes to acquire an interest in it—some little spot that he may call his own. It is a deep, absorbing feeling, that nature has planted in us. The sailor on the "vasty deep," the lone Indian and wild bee hunter on the prairies of Missouri; the mountaineer, as he threads his chamios track; and the soldier, perishing for fame ere he freezes into a stiffened corse; dreams, all dream, of their early home; and when every other feeling is subdued and withered, the heart that would not blench at scenes of crime and blood will soften under the Rans de Vache, the early song of childhood.

It is an undying feeling; and, when one has gone out from his father's wasted roof, and, in the untrodden forest, clustered his family around some humble shed, can he see it wrested from him by the laws of his country, without cursing that country and those who govern it? Sir, what can compensate a Government for the loss of the love of its people? What is your overflowing Treasury, when it is filtered from the tears of the wretched, wrung from the hard earnings of those who would coin their blood for your protection, and rampart round this Capitol with their dead bodies before it should be polluted by the presence of an enemy? Sir, if you wish to perpetuate this Union; if you wish to extinguish the fatal feeling to which I have alluded, to secure the quiet enjoyment of vested rights for ages to come, you will give to every man who seeks it a home in the soil. There is little faith in parchments or charters, or in the liberty they effect to guaranty; but it is probable this Government would endure uncounted centuries, if every quarter section of the public domain was the bona fide property of an actual settler. Incorporate every man with the soil, cluster around him the blessed endearments of home, and you bind him in an allegiance stronger than a thousand oaths.

Mr. ASHLEY, said he could not agree with the gentleman from Mississippi, as to the want of co-operation on the part of the Eastern members in matters touching the interest of the West. On the contrary, he (Mr. A.) had every reason to speak in terms of high acknowledgment of the attention he had received to the interests of the West. As to the resolution before the House, he moved its reference to the Committee on Public Lands. That, he thought, was the appropriate committee, and must be considered more conversant with questions affecting the public land than any select committee that could be raised.

Mr. JARVIS said he had an amendment himself to offer, but he was willing to waive it. He thought that the discussion should end here, especially as he was anxious that the new States should have an opportunity to present resolutions. He therefore moved the previous question.

And the House refused to second the call: Ayes 60, noes not counted.

Mr. MANN, of New York, said it must be apparent, by this time, that this proposition was neither more nor less than a new edition of the old and exploded idea of distributing the proceeds of the sales of the public lands, attempted to be concealed under rubbish and verbiage, and gilded over by the patriotic idea of applying it to public education. Its paternity is suspicious, and its hope fallacious and delusive. The resolution following the preamble discloses its object in its argument: "to avoid the objection of one State holding land in another, the committee are to be instructed to report a provision that the lands be sold by the United States, and the proceeds given to the old States for the purposes of education." Sir, (said Mr. M.,) what more distinct surrender of the principle of dividing "the spoils" of the public lands among the States could be desired, than is contained in this provision?

Sir, gentlemen sometimes express their surprise at the various propositions submitted; but, sir, I am no longer surprised at any thing occurring here. I have been here too long for that, sir. But I will admit that I heard the remarks of my friend from Mississippi [Mr. CLAYBORN] on this subject with regret. I am confident, however, sir, that those remarks proceeded from any other cause than a sense of the injustice or illiberality of Congress towards the new States; and I am sure that, on more experience here, and a more careful consideration of the subject upon broad and liberal principles, my honorable and talented young friend will not cherish any of the feelings he has expressed. I know (said Mr. M.) the purity of his feelings and the generosity of his nature too well, I trust, to suppose him for a moment capable of acting upon local, selfish, or narrow principles, to favor his own or any other State.

The preamble (Mr. M. repeated) to this resolution is illusory and deceptive, addressed to the cupidity of the old States represented upon this floor. It recites the grants made by Congress to each of the new States of the public lands in the aggregate, without specifying the motive or consideration upon which they were made. Its argument is, that an equal quantity should be granted to the old States, to make them respectively equal sharers in the public lands. Now, sir, (said Mr. M.,) nothing could be devised more disingenuous and deceptive. Let us look at it briefly. The idea is that the old States granted these lands to the new for an implied consideration, and resulting benefit to themselves; that it was a sort of Indian gift to be refunded with increase. Not so, sir, at all. If Mr. M. understood the motives inducing those grants, they were paternal on the part of the old States; proceeding upon that generous and noble liberality which induces a wealthy father to advance and provide for his children. This was the moving consideration, though he (Mr. M.) was aware that the grants in aid of the improvements of the new States and Territories were upon consideration of advancing the sale and improvement of the remaining lands in those States held by the United States.

We were now asked, he (Mr. M.) believed, for the first and he hoped for the last time, to destroy that parental and fraternal feeling which had always bound the new States to the old in an indissoluble union, by array-ing before them our liberal beneficence, and claiming from them an equivalent. Sir, we should remember that the people of the new States are our enterprising citizens from the old—our friends and our children; and if we establish the principle contained in this proposition, we might as well claim from them a remuneration for all our appropriations to make their roads, to open and render habitable the country sought by their enterprise. We might, in short, claim a remuneration for the loss of our population and wealth which has been transferred from the old to the new States. The principle carried out would result in this. Mr. M. said he perceived that the States of Kentucky and Tennessee were to share in this proposed bounty. Most of the old States possessed a large share of land which they have devoted to the various purposes of their own infant Governments. When the people of the new left the old States, they relinquished their interests in those lands, and the funds proceeding from them; and this consideration has, perhaps, had some effect with Congress in extending their liberality to the people of the new States. It should do so.

The United States continue to hold their large domain in those new States, and to derive a revenue therefrom. Not so with the States of Kentucky and Tennessee. These were not colonial States. How did they acquire title to the lands within their jurisdiction? Not by grant from the United States, or any one of them. Time will not permit, Mr. Speaker, to relate the history of those transactions now. Suffice it to say, they made "lawful prize of the lands" they now hold, no matter whether by discovery or conquest. They wish now to share a new division of spoils; and, if any is to be had, perhaps it is right they should.

Mr. M. concluded by saying that, when it shall be in order, he would move to strike out the preamble to this resolution entirely, as illusory, argumentative, and deceptive.

The SPEAKER said the motion was not now in order.

Mr. MANN gave notice that, when in order, he would renew the motion.

Mr. CAMBRELENG said that he thought it would be better to dispose of one resolution at a time, and for this purpose he would move that the House proceed to the orders of the day; which motion prevailed.

EXECUTIVE ADMINISTRATION.

The House then resumed the consideration of the resolution, originally submitted by Mr. WISE, and the amendment proposed thereto by Mr. PEACOCK, of Rhode Island, for an inquiry into alleged abuses of the executive departments of the Government.

Mr. ROBERTSON observed that, although entitled to the floor, he had not intended to interrupt the business in which the House had been just engaged, by a call for the order of the day. In truth, he should have preferred that the subject now under consideration should have been permitted to lie over until his colleague, who had presented the original resolution, [Mr. WISE,] should be present to defend it. But it had been the pleasure of the House to order it otherwise; and, concurring as he did in the propriety of that resolution, he should reluctantly assume the task, which his colleague would have so much more ably performed, of vindicating it against the objections urged in debate, and the insidious attempt, by way of amendment, to defeat it.

The present discussion (said Mr. R.) has been pronounced by a gentleman, who took part in it, [Mr. MANN, of New York,] one of the most useless that ever occurred in this hall. And, so far as respects the success of the proposed measure, the remark, judging from the fate of similar efforts to obtain the privilege of inquiring into the condition of the executive departments, may be perfectly just. But that gentleman regards it as useless, because, he tells us, no one now objects to the passage of the resolution in some shape or other. We shall see, sir, how this is when the vote shall be taken. But granting it to be true, still it is all-important that the shape of the resolution be such as will attain the object in view. If the form proposed by my colleague be adopted, it will justify a thorough investigation; if the amendment prevail, all inquiry may be suppressed. Gentlemen, however disposed to investigate, may be unwilling to assume the character of accusers or witnesses. They may not personally know the truth of the facts into which they would inquire, nor choose to vouch for the suspicions which are abroad. To demand a specific accusation before inquiry is to reverse the order of proceeding. The very purpose of an investigation is to ascertain whether there is or is not ground for accusation. If specific charges could be made and sustained, without a previous inquiry, inquiry would be unnecessary; we might proceed, at once, to impeach the officer, or correct the abuse. The shape of the resolution, therefore, is not matter of form merely, as gentlemen would seem to imply. In one form it will throw the door open to inquiry; in another it slams it in your face. If the form be so very immaterial that all discussion is useless, why, sir, was the resolution, originally proposed by my colleague, not accepted at once? Why has an amendment been offered so unacceptable to him and to those who concur with him? Unless this amendment was designed to prevent the full investigation they ask, what purpose could it answer, except to provoke that useless debate, of which gentlemen complain, and in which they have taken so large a share? Instead, however, of taking the vote upon a resolution which, it is said, all are willing in some shape to adopt, it has been vehemently assailed, and a multitude of objections, utterly frivolous and inconsistent, have been arrayed against it.

The gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. PEARCE] objects that it is not bold enough. To use his own elegant metaphor, "it does not take the bull by the horns." If gentlemen have any thing to say against the President, he desires it shall be done in due form, and then, we are to understand, full latitude would be allowed. But he immediately refutes his own objection; for he adds that, in passing upon the acts of the President's ministers, we necessarily pass upon him.

The gentleman from Louisiana, [Mr. RIPLEY,] on his part, objects to the resolution expressly upon the ground that it is a direct assault upon the President himself; that it imputes to him falsehood and corruption; and declares, that to institute an inquiry would be to sanction the charge. Thus, sir, one objects because the resolution is not bold enough, the other because it is too bold; one because it does not take the bull by the horns, the other because it does. It is impossible that both can be right in the reasons assigned, yet both will concur in voting against the resolution; and, shape our course as we may, we cannot reconcile the one without disoblighing the other.

None will contend that my colleague's resolution is not sufficiently broad. That, sir, is the fatal objection; it was designed to be effectual. Gentlemen complain that it is too broad; not specific enough. It is very much, says the gentleman from New York, [Mr. MANN,] in the nature of a general search-warrant; and the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. LANE] is opposed to a roving, unlimited, unrestricted committee. Let us suppose that these objections prevail, and that a committee is appointed under the restrictions imposed by the amendment. My colleague, as chairman, proceeds at its head to the Treasury Department. The sign of Reuben M. Whitney, in large capitals, attracts his notice. My colleague, you know, sir, has always manifested a strong desire to investigate the nature of the alleged connexion between Whitney and the Treasury. He is about to enter. Stop, say the gentlemen, specify your charges. I make none, my colleague replies; I come to institute an inquiry. Then we cannot proceed, sir; we are not a roving, unrestricted committee. Besides, sir, this Mr. Whitney is a private gentleman; he occupies a barber's shop. Barber's shops doubtless may be found sometimes very convenient appendages to banks, to enable them to shave their customers; but my colleague might be at a loss to understand what occasion there could be for one, if it be of that description, so near the Treasury. Overruled, he proceeds to the other departments. He requests to see the official correspondence. What is your specific charge? I wish to inquire into the appointment or dismissal of such and such officers; the recent appointment of Hocker, for instance, who, it has been stated on this floor, kept back the poll-books of an election for party purposes, and has been rewarded with office in the midst of an insulted and indignant community. Do you charge corruption or abuse? No; my object is to inquire. We can only inquire into specific charges. Permit me, then, to see the books of the office. Hold, sir; what particular entry do you allege to be false or fraudulent? I cannot tell, says my colleague, what the entries may disclose before I am permitted to see them. That would be in the nature of a general search. He is again overruled; the books remain sealed books for him, and he returns from his fruitless errand, as wise as he went. But he makes a report; and how does he respond to the broad assertions of the message? Is all right? Are our public functionaries all diligent, all honest? Sir, he cannot answer the question. He has been permitted to open no book, to inspect no record. And this mock examination is to be claimed on behalf of men at the head of our executive departments; of honorable men, it is said, unjustly assailed! Were you to enter the house of a suspected felon in search of stolen goods, he might be expected to insist that general search-warrants were unconstitutional, and to forbid you to open a closet, or turn a key, until you should specify, on oath, the article alleged to have been purloined; and, if brought to trial, he might call on some quibbling attorney to seize on any flaw in the indictment to get him off. But men filling high and responsible stations cannot, without dishonor, rely upon any defence which precludes a thorough investigation into their official conduct. Such a course would justly excite suspicions, where none existed before; and where they did, would confirm them. What, sir, would you think of the clerk of a bank, or other institution, over which you might preside, who should refuse you permission to inspect his books, unless you should first make a specific charge, and designate the particular entry to prove it? Would you not infer guilt, and instantly dismiss him from your service?

Sir, the investigation now proposed on the part of the public in no respect differs from that which every private institution or individual is at liberty to make. The people surely have the same right to know in what way their affairs are managed by their own agents. They will not be satisfied that such an investigation shall be denounced as inquisitorial; refused, unless their representatives shall step forward as witnesses or accusers; or, if allowed, that committees shall be sent into the public offices hoodwinked, and tied down to specific allegations. Still less will they agree to be told that executive officers are not the servants of the people, but the President's ministers, more sacred, even, than the ministers of a King; that all inquiry into their conduct shall be suppressed, because the President has borne testimony to their fidelity, and to question that is to assail his veracity. Yes, sir, such are the doctrines now heard on this floor. To this complexion have we come at last.

H. of R.]

Executive Administration.

But, sir, while one gentleman [Mr. RIPLEY] denounces the proposed inquiry as inquisitorial, and another [Mr. LANE] as wholly unprecedented, the gentleman from Rhode Island is opposed to it because it is already provided for by the rules of the House. Several of the standing committees, he tells us, among others the Committee of Ways and Means, have authority to do every thing contemplated by the resolution. If so, sir, surely the proceeding is not without precedent; and, if inquisitorial in its character, why does not the gentleman from Louisiana move to abolish the rules which require it? It is impossible to reconcile these inconsistencies. There is nothing inquisitorial or illegal demanded by the resolution. It proposes to insure the performance of an important duty which we owe to the country, and which has been too long neglected.

But if the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. LANE] will not regard the authority conferred by the rules of the House on its standing committees as a precedent in point, what will he say to the precedent in the case of the Post Office examination? Aware of its force, he sought to evade it by telling us that that examination was moved for by the chairman of the Post Office Committee. What then, sir? The objection is not to the power, but to the member who applies; not to the resolution, but to the mover. It would, indeed, appear so. But two days past, a resolution, offered by one of my colleagues, [Mr. GARLAND,] to inquire into the connexion between Whitney and the Treasury, was unanimously adopted—unanimously—though, in substance, the same with that which another colleague, on a different side of the House, [Mr. WISE,] had, during a great part of the last session, struggled in vain to carry through. Yes, sir, fortunately, the Post Office investigation was moved for by a friend of the administration; it was directed, too, notwithstanding the President had proclaimed that all was well, by those who certainly did not mean to impeach his veracity. No specific charges were demanded. The committee was vested with a sweeping authority to examine, generally, into the condition and proceedings of the Post Office Department; and the result of its labors was the development of a mass of iniquity, seldom surpassed in the history of the most corrupt Governments. Suppose, sir, the doctrine of specifications had been then enforced. Who could have specified the neglects, the frauds, the erasures, the corrupt and collusive practices of every kind, which prevailed in the Department, many of which were, for the first time, discovered in the progress of the examination, and astonished even those who suspected most? What sized document would it have required to comprise the specifications? And now, when an examination is proposed into all the departments—every one of which, it was once broadly intimated by an administration gentleman on this floor, [Mr. SMITH,] if the light should be let in, would disclose similar delinquencies—it is gravely insisted that no inquiry shall be made, or, if authorized, that it shall extend to no abuses except such as shall be specifically alleged.

Sir, there is no want of authority in this House, or of precedents, to justify a general examination into the condition and proceedings of the departments. All that is wanting is the inclination to exert it. Gentlemen should show precedent for refusing it. During the last administration, when Chilton's resolutions were under discussion, and every species of corruption imputed, the gentleman from Rhode Island, who now calls for specific charges, though then a friend of that administration, declared that the more extensive the inquiry, the more he should be pleased. He wished that a history of its whole proceedings could be written in sunbeams in the heavens, that all might see; and the administration party, to their honor, voted for the resolutions, without one dissenting voice. What a contrast does not their conduct exhibit to that of the party now in power, who object to inquiry, while constantly proclaiming their willingness to meet it, because it may wound the President; or seek to shelter the public officers under exceptions to form?

Are gentlemen serious, sir, in this demand for specific charges? Why was it, then, that a resolution, offered last session, demanding an inquiry into an alleged illicit connexion between Whitney and the Treasury, was repeatedly and finally rejected? Even the amendment offered by my colleague, from the Brunswick district, [Mr. DROMGOOLE,] proposing humbly to solicit the information from the Secretary of the Treasury, the officer implicated, ultimately failed; the gentlemen now calling for specifications, [Messrs. MANN, PEARCE, RIPLEY, and LANE,] with one voice voting against the last proposition to take it up, made by my colleague from Accomack, [Mr. WISE,] and succeeding, with an administration minority of 59, in stifling all inquiry.

But, if it shall be the pleasure of the House to adopt the amendment; if specific charges must be made, it will, perhaps, not be so difficult to present them as gentlemen may have imagined. Charges have been made upon this floor, upon authority which the gentleman from Rhode Island, at least, will not question, well meriting investigation. Sir, they were made by the gentleman himself. I was not present; but I am not permitted to doubt, though it seems almost incredible, that the gentleman who, some four or five years ago, delivered a speech in this hall on the resolution relating to the Wiscasset collector, and who bore the same name, and represented the same State, is the same gentleman who offered the amendment, and whom I now behold sitting near me. Heu quantum mutatus ab illo! I beg leave to recapitulate some of the most prominent charges.

Mr. ROBERTSON then enumerated a variety of charges contained in the speech of the member from Rhode Island, in April, 1832.—(Congressional Debates, vol. 8, p. 2397.) He read passages to show that the member had substantially charged the President and his party—

With neglecting the reform and retrenchment they were pledged to effect;

With viewing those who had previously been in office as conquered enemies, and the offices themselves as the spoils of victory.

He said that the gentleman, to use his own expressive language, had taken the bull by the horns, and had charged the President himself—

With improperly appointing members of Congress to office;

With using his official patronage and influence to make Mr. Van Buren his successor;

With contemning the authority of a co-ordinate branch of the Government, the Senate; and

With usurping or abusing the power of appointment.

Mr. ROBERTSON commented upon these charges, and the arguments and proofs adduced by the member from Rhode Island in support of them. He said that the abuses complained of had never been investigated—that it was time to inquire whether the charges were well founded, and if so to provide a remedy.

He observed that to the list of members of Congress named by the member from Rhode Island, on whom executive favor had been bestowed, numerous others might now be added; that the President had indulged in this practice, the corrupt tendency of which he had himself pointed out, to an unexampled extent.

To the instances adduced to prove the President's contempt for the authority of the Senate—those of Stambaugh and Rector—he would add that of Gwinn, and the more recent case of the former Speaker of this House; and argued that the President, in keeping persons in office whom the Senate had rejected, or keeping offices vacant which the public service required should be filled, until the Senate should conform to his will, had, in effect, appropriated the whole power of appointment to himself, and violated the constitution, in its spirit, if not in its letter.

Executive Administration.

[H. or R.]

In regard to the charge against him of using his official patronage and influence in the election of his successor, he would only say that, if the gentleman from Rhode Island, nearly five years past, saw grounds to believe that the President had thrown "his mantle" upon Mr. Van Buren; if he thought himself justified in presenting the vivid picture he then drew of the President with his pet candidate "on his shoulders;" it was impossible he could have seen any thing since to shake his belief; on the contrary, the Gwinn letter, the Baltimore caucus, the late electioneering tour into Tennessee, were corroborating proofs, with many others, that the President had kept his eye steadily on his object, until it had been finally consummated.

While upon this subject, said Mr. R., as the merits of the President elect have been brought into discussion, I will take the occasion to say, that however reprehensible I may consider the manner of his elevation to the presidency, for one, I am unwilling to prejudge his course; still more to proclaim in advance an uncompromising hostility to his administration. He is constitutionally elected. The people have, at least, gone through the forms of an election; and we owe it to them to give his measures a candid consideration. Nor is there any thing in the course prescribed to him to justify, in my opinion, predetermined opposition from any quarter. It is true, the humiliating condition has been imposed upon him of following in the footsteps, and carrying out the principles, as they are called, of General Jackson; but this, in reality, is no restriction: it gives him full latitude; a carte blanche to steer his course to any point of the political compass. For what principle is there, or measure, which has ever agitated or divided the American people, in respect to which General Jackson has not, at different times, held opposite positions? Let us test the operation of this pledge upon the future policy of the administration.

Will Mr. Van Buren favor retrenchment and reform? Why, sir, so did General Jackson: it was the very watchword of the party. Will he set his face against them? He may plead the example of his predecessor.

Will he recommend a protecting tariff? He will find full authority in the early messages of General Jackson, and in his course during the controversy with South Carolina. Will he discountenance the principle of protection? The later messages, especially the last, if they do not abandon it, fritter it away until it ceases to be of any practical importance; besides, General Jackson was always for a judicious tariff; and that we know is any tariff that is popular with the majority.

A national bank: what course will he take in relation to that? The prediction has been made, by far-sighted politicians, that four years will not elapse, certainly not five, before such an institution will be organized. I trust, sir, it is a false prophecy. But Mr. Van Buren may recommend or approve it in conformity with the opinions of General Jackson in the messages of 1829 and 1830; or he may denounce uncompromising hostility, and refer to the battle with the monster.

Internal improvement: will he oppose the doctrine? We shall be told it had been long since crushed beneath the Maysville veto. Will he sanction it? The enormous expenditures lavished on this unjust system during the present administration, greatly exceeding, it is believed, those of all the preceding administrations together, will prove that he is still following the footsteps of General Jackson.

Will he maintain inviolate the rights of the States?

Why, he and General Jackson were always Jeffersonian republicans—strict constructionists. Will he trample them beneath his feet? He may hold up the proclamation, and show that he is but carrying out the principles of General Jackson.

The surplus revenue: will he recommend its distribution among the States? The messages of 1829 and 1830 will support the recommendation, and refute every argument against its propriety. Will he deny the right of Congress to return to the people what has been unlawfully wrested from them? So does the message of 1836, which contains a full recantation of the doctrines of 1830.

So, sir, he may reward members of Congress with executive appointments, or denounce such appointments as making corruption the order of the day; he may deprecate the use of official patronage in interfering with the freedom of elections, or employ it in securing the election of his own favorite to the presidency, and not depart from the footsteps of his predecessor.

I repeat that the pledge of Mr. Van Buren to carry out the principles of General Jackson commits him to no settled scheme of policy. There may, sir, perhaps, be one exception, on a subject of great interest to the country: I mean the disposition of the public domain. Upon that I fear, from the tenor of the last message, and more especially from what fell this morning from the gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. CLAIBORNE,] that his policy has been already decided, and pledges given of peculiar favor to the new States. That gentleman, if I correctly apprehended his remarks, intimated that such expectations had been created, which had induced himself, and the State he represents, to support Mr. Van Buren, a stranger to them, in preference to Judge White, a highly respected friend and neighbor; and threats were held out of a refusal to vote appropriations, or to act with the party in power, unless those expectations were speedily fulfilled.

[Mr. CLAIBORNE explained. He said that, in the warmth of argument, he might have expressed himself in terms that did not properly convey his meaning. He and his constituents regarded Mr. Van Buren as every way qualified for the presidency: believing this, they were induced to support him in preference to Judge White, because they had reasons to think his election would be more favorable to the views and interests of the new States. He meant to convey no threat.]

Mr. ROBERTSON. I am incapable, sir, of misrepresenting any thing said on this floor. The gentleman's explanation leaves the matter just as I stated it. I should not have adverted to the remarks he made, had I not supposed they fully expressed his sentiments. If his judgment, upon reflection, does not approve them, I waive any further observation upon them. I must acknowledge, however, sir, that I should have been pleased to hear what reasons the gentleman had for the expectations it seems he and his constituents entertain; and I warn him, and the party with whom he acts, that the old States, who surrendered this immense domain for the common benefit of all, will never yield their perfect right to participate equally, at least, in that which was once exclusively their own.

But except in the particular instance, Mr. Speaker, which I have just mentioned, if that be an exception, there is scarcely a single principle or measure which Mr. Van Buren may not adopt or repudiate, without violating his pledge to follow in the footsteps of General Jackson. He will be borne out in either case by the precept or practice of his predecessor. In most cases he will find both; the precept one way, and the practice the other.

Let him, then, as he may in good faith, adopt those which will bring about a reformation of the manifold abuses of the Government, and a reduction of its present wasteful expenditures; let him set his face against the schemes of the abolitionists; discountenance an iniquitous tariff, a national bank, an unjust and unconstitutional system of internal improvement; let him abstain from violating the rights of the States; from the exercise of undelegated and doubtful powers; from the corrupting practice of bestowing lucrative appointments on members of Congress; let him, sir, above all, following the advice of his predecessor, exterminate the monster, party spirit, and take care that the public offices be filled with capable and honest men; let him do this, conforming to the good old republican doctrines, and his measures at least shall have my humble support, here or elsewhere; and, I doubt not, that of my friend from South Carolina, [Mr. PICKENS,] who has so indignantly and eloquently denounced the principles that have brought him into power.

[Mr. PICKENS requested his friend from Virginia would allow him to explain. He said he had declared uncompromising hostility to the principles upon which the new administration was coming into power, and that nothing could reconcile him to ratify those principles by a re-election of the man, although he might be found supporting any of his measures that might be sound.]

Mr. ROBERTSON said the observations alluded to had probably been misunderstood, and he was pleased that the opportunity had been afforded of correcting any misapprehension.

But, sir, I have too far already, I fear, violated parliamentary order, though not perhaps congressional usage, in following other gentlemen who have touched on the course of the next administration. The two administrations are so connected, or, rather, identified, that it is difficult to look at the one without seeing the other. Like the colors of the rainbow, they are so happily blended that it is not easy to say where one ends or the other begins. We behold, indeed, not so much a new administration as a continuation of the old one, under a new name; not so properly a succession as a regency—that, sir, is the appropriate name—bound to carry out the views and obey the will of the reigning monarch.

I have enumerated, Mr. Speaker, specific charges made by the gentleman from Rhode Island; sufficient, perhaps, to occupy the attention of the committee for the residue of this session. If the gentleman will not obey the suggestion of some of his friends, and withdraw the amendment, I shall ask permission to insert these charges in it, in order, as he will probably be a member of the committee, that he may have an opportunity afforded him of making them good.

There is one other charge, however, founded on occurrences of a later date, that ought not to be omitted. I allude to the removal of Melvill, Coggeshall, and others, from subordinate appointments in the customs, by Littlefield, the collector of Newport. An account of this transaction will be found among the records of the Senate, in a report made on the last day of the last session.

Sir, the gentleman from Rhode Island objected to the resolution before us because the committee might require the departments to furnish information relating to removals from office. He seemed horror-struck at the bare thought of such an investigation. Well may it be dreaded; for there is no part of the action of the Government in which there would probably be found more corruption, injustice, and oppression. But this, sir, is a specific charge, made by one of his own fellow-citizens, of an abuse practised in his own State; and the gentleman will, I trust, aid the committee in ascertaining its truth.

Melvill states, in his petition, that he held his appointment under the former collector, Ellery, for ten years; that Ellery was satisfied with his conduct, and so informed Littlefield, his successor; that he was continued in office by Littlefield until March last, when he, with four others, was removed. He ascribes these removals to the influence of party spirit, and more immediately to the proceedings of "an administration meeting," held at Newport, and at which it is said the gentleman from Rhode Island was present. I ask that his statement on this subject may be read.

The Clerk read the following passage:

"Not long after Mr. Littlefield became collector, he was called on by those who recommended him to office, to know why he had not made the removals from and appointments to office which he had promised, in case he obtained the appointment of collector. He was accused of keeping in employment those who had uniformly opposed the administration, to the exclusion of its supporters; and he was threatened with their displeasure if he did not speedily comply with his engagements, made previous to his appointment. A meeting of partisans was soon after held, styling themselves 'a committee of the administration party,' where a list was made out of the officers of the customs required to be removed, and of those who were selected to be appointed in their places; which was sent to the collector, Littlefield, with a request that he would immediately make those removals and appointments; which list of proscribed officers, and those who were to take their places, was sent by the collector, as his own list, to the Secretary of the Treasury for his approval, and it was approved of by the Secretary of the Treasury.

"Of the officers attached to the customs at Newport, who held office when Mr. Littlefield came in as a collector, three were retained and five removed; of the three retained, one had not recently opposed the administration, and gave assurances that he would not in future; the other two had uniformly voted with the administration party. Of the five removed, one had sometimes voted with the administration party, but declined voting when members of the General Assembly were to be chosen, who were to elect a Senator to Congress, his father-in-law being the whig candidate; two of them were not freeholders, of course had no vote; and two others, by their votes, had uniformly opposed the administration party."

Melvill further states, in his petition, that Littlefield told him that Coggeshall had been removed because he and his son uniformly voted against the administration; that no complaints had been made against him, (Melvill;) that he had performed his duties correctly and faithfully; that it was not the collector's wish that he should be removed; and that he should be pleased to see him reinstated, which he thought might be effected by a proper representation to the Secretary of the Treasury. He further states than an honorable member of Congress from Rhode Island, for whom he had voted as long as he had a vote, and to whom he applied for an explanation of the cause of his removal, informed him "that it was stated by one of the committee who made the nominations, that, five or six years ago, when Governor Penner was a candidate for Governor, although Melvill voted for him, yet he voted for the whole opposition ticket." But the strongest reason for his removal was, "that he was not possessed of a freehold estate, and could be of no use to the party, even if he was favorable to their measures;" "that it was incumbent on the party to husband all their resources;" but further said, if he would "possess himself of a freehold estate, and support the administration, he should be appointed to a better office, when the new custom-house act should pass." As to Coggeshall, that this same member of Congress told him he (C.) had been reinstated upon "the express condition that he and his son should in future vote on the side of the administration." Melvill solicited the Secretary of the Treasury to inform him for what cause he had been removed, declaring that it would be a source of consolation to him and his family to know that there were no charges against him of incompetency or neglect. He addressed him again, representing all the facts of his case, his support of the administration ever since the first election of General Jackson, his faithful services in office, his inability at his advanced age, if deprived of its emoluments, to support a numerous family. He appealed to him for justice. The Secretary replied that his communications had been referred to the collector, with instructions to report upon his case. He requested a copy of the report; and received a brief answer, that the collector had only exercised his legal rights, and that the Department saw no occasion for its further interference, but would leave the responsibility on the collector. He repeated his request, and was answered that "the representations of collectors to the Department were, generally, of a confidential nature." He then, sir, presented his memorial to the Senate. He asked nothing for himself, but prayed that such legislation might be had as would restrain, in future, such an abuse of power as had been practised towards him.

The gentleman from Louisiana indignantly denounces all inquiry into the conduct of four executive Departments, as inquisitorial. What will he say to the inquisition which those Departments themselves have avowedly established? The character of every public officer, of every citizen of the country, lies at the mercy of these secret tribunals, liable to be stabbed in the dark by the hand of an unseen assassin. Little, sir, does Levi Woodbury deserve the high encomium that gentleman passed upon him, if the document I have referred to contains the truth. If, sir, he knew and approved the oppression exercised towards Melvill, his heart is as hard as the granite rock of his native State. I go further: if the facts are as they are represented on the oath of a man whose veracity seems not to be questioned, and the Secretary of the Treasury has sanctioned these proceedings, he deserves to be disgracefully deprived of the power he abuses. Yes, sir, unless Mr. Madison, the purity of whose life and principles will exhibit a striking contrast with those of some who will figure in the annals of the present day, has strangely misconceived the nature of this offence, it is one for which the President himself would be justly subjected to impeachment and removal. An old and faithful public servant is to be dismissed because he is too poor to buy a vote, or too honest to sell one. He is of no further use to the party; that party, sir, who profess to be the exclusive friends of the poor; and in his old age reduced to beggary, his reputation, all that is left him, blasted, perhaps forever, and the privilege denied him of knowing the charges against him, or being confronted with his accuser. Yes, the official document in the possession of the Treasury Department, which shows the real ground of his removal, and may prove his innocence, withheld, not from him only, but even from a committee of the Senate.

There is one circumstance disclosed in these proceedings that should not pass unnoticed. It shows the slavish doctrines that the system of proscription adopted by the present administration is but too well calculated to inculcate. One of the removed officers—removed, as he seems to suppose, solely upon political considerations—testifies that he informed the collector that, though officers of the United States Government might vote as they pleased in State or municipal elections, "it was his fixed opinion that a man holding an office under the Government of the United States was not justified in voting against any officer who was favorable to those who administered the Government." This, sir, is the democratic republican doctrine: that no man is worthy of an office who is not ready to sacrifice his conscience for the good of his party; and we are not to be permitted to inquire even into the action of the Government which is thus destroying the freedom of election. It would bring suspicion upon the heads of the departments. Their reputations, we are told by the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. LANE,] are like those of innocent women; to suspect is to damn them. Then, sir, are they damned already, beyond redemption; blasted long since, by the gentleman from Rhode Island. Sir, that gentleman, when denouncing official corruption in the case of the Wiscasset collector, said, and said truly, that innocence has nothing to fear. No; and, if we may judge of the future by the past, guilt has nothing to fear. What punishment followed the unparalleled negligence, corruption, and abuse, detected in the Post Office? It is known, sir, throughout the country. The head of the Department was forthwith removed, and promoted to one of the highest and most honorable stations in the gift of the Executive.

Every means is taken to elude investigation. The gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. RILEY] has even condescended to appeal to our sympathy, by representing the President as lying on his sick bed, and talks of the ingratitude of republics. Ingratitude is not so often the sin of republics as gratitude is the grave of their liberty. It is the gratitude of the people that too often overlooks the faults of some brilliant conqueror, and arms him with power—their own power—to crush them. What more would the gentleman ask for General Jackson? He has received, as well as the gentleman himself, a full share of the honors and emoluments of the country. I am grateful to both; and equally so to the poor soldier who fought under their command, and whose bones whiten the battle-fields of our country. I profess none of that sickly sensibility that yields all the glory and honor to the great and powerful, and expends itself in lamentations for their calamities. I regret to hear of the bodily suffering of the President, as much as I would of yours, sir, or of that of the gentleman from Louisiana; no more. But what connexion is there between the President's indisposition and the measure under consideration? If any gentleman will say that the President's personal attendance is necessary, I will vote to defer the inquiry until he shall be restored. But I cannot consent that all legislation shall be suspended because the President is sick; that our frontier shall be ravaged, the poor Indian robbed and massacred for his property, the speculator fatten on the public spoils, and corruption and oppression go unpunished and unexamined, because the President is sick. I will not believe that this investigation will give him pain. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. GLASCOCK] tells us that he is authorized to say that the President desires a strict investigation; and gentlemen ought not to distrust his sincerity. Sir, sick as he is, it is better that he should sometimes hear the plain language of truth, than to be nauseated with doses of flattery served up daily from this hall.

It is time this struggle should end. Gentlemen tell us it is too late; it is the short session, and one committee cannot perform the task. Last year I had the honor of proposing a similar investigation, and, that it might be effectual, asked a separate committee for each distinct head of inquiry. But then, sir, it was the long session. In the long session, six or seven committees are too many. In the short session, one is not enough. True, sir, it is a Herculean labor; but let us make a beginning. If the Augean stables cannot be thoroughly cleansed, at least the filthy heap may be removed that blocks up the entrance.

Before Mr. ROBERTSON had finished his speech, (the whole of which is given above,) he gave way to a motion for adjournment.

And the House adjourned.

Public Lands.

[JAN. 5, 1837.]

THURSDAY, JANUARY 5.
THE PUBLIC LANDS.

The House resumed the consideration of the following resolution; offered on yesterday by Mr. CHILTON ALLAN:

To which the following amendments were pending:

By Mr. VINTON:

"Resolved, That said committee be further instructed to inquire into the expediency of inserting a clause in said bill to pay said new States the value of the improvements made by them on the public lands, or to pay to them the amount the public lands would have been assessed for taxes, if they had been private property."

By Mr. CLATBORNE, of Mississippi, to amend the amendment by adding thereto the following:

"And provided that no such grant shall interfere with or be located on the claim or improvement of any actual settler on the public lands."

Mr. A. G. HARRISON said, that when the gentleman from Kentucky introduced his resolution on yesterday, he was at first inclined to think that it would be improper then to go into a discussion of the merits of the question, and felt willing that the resolution should be referred without debate; but maturer reflection had convinced him that he was in an error, and that it was proper a full discussion should be had, and the subject thoroughly understood, in order that the House might indicate, by its present movements, its future disposition of the subject. Sir, said Mr. H., the subject of the public lands, their future disposition by Congress, is one vitally interesting to the people I represent; and the change contemplated by the resolutions under consideration is of so extraordinary a character that I feel constrained, however unprepared, to submit a few remarks before the question is taken.

Sir, the statement of the gentleman in his preamble, in relation to the amount of the public lands that had been given to the new States, in the way of grants, is wholly deceptive. It assumes the position, and is anxious to produce the impression, that these grants, on the part of the General Government, were a gratuity; that the new States had rendered no equivalent, and that no valuable consideration had passed. Never, sir, was there any thing more untrue. Sir, we paid a high price, the highest possible price which freemen can pay, for the grants that were made to us, and for the privilege of coming into this Union. We gave up a portion of our sacred rights as a free and sovereign people; of those rights, Mr. Speaker, which you and your State enjoys—which all of the old States of this Union possess, but which are prohibited to us. We gave up the right of taxing lands lying within our own limits, one of the highest attributes of sovereignty. Sir, it is the living principle of sovereignty—the self-existing spring of all free Governments. It was this, sir, that we gave up; this is the price that we paid for the lands that we got from the General Government by express stipulation, and which the gentleman is pleased to denominate donations. What are these donations, and how came the General Government to give and the States to receive them? I will explain it. Upon the admission of the new States into the Union, there were always stipulations submitted by the General Government to the States wishing to enter into the Union, to which they were obliged to agree before coming in. Examine all the various ordinances that were passed by Congress upon the several new States coming into the Union, and it will be invariably found that the lands which the gentleman has paraded before the world as donations were given to the States for specified purposes, as an equivalent for that part of sovereignty which they had surrendered—not to tax the public lands, nor the lands sold at private sale, for five years after the sale. In the admission of Ohio into the Union, the General Government submits three propositions to her, which she was to have upon her complying with the conditions imposed; and these propositions were, 1st, That Ohio should have every sixteenth section for school purposes; 2d, That the salt springs, with the sections of land which include them, should be given to her; and, 3d, That one twentieth part of the nett proceeds of the lands lying within the said State, after deducting all expenses, should be applied to the laying out and making public roads, &c., on the conditions that the convention of said State shall provide by an ordinance, irrevocable without the consent of the United States, that every and each tract of land sold after a certain day shall be and remain exempt from any tax paid by order or under the authority of the State, for the space of five years, &c. Such, sir, were the conditions imposed by the General Government upon all of the new States; and such is the price, with the additional imposition that we should not tax the public lands, which we have paid for the lands that were given to us for the purpose, dictated to us, of erecting common schools and seminaries of learning. These were the conditions required of us, and which we had quietly to submit to, and take as an equivalent for the birthright we gave up; and they were imposed upon us at a time when we could not refuse, and exacted by one whose power we could not control, and whose injustice we could neither escape nor avert.

I deny, sir, that my State has received one acre more than she was entitled to under the bond. It is true the gentleman has brought an account against her of 1,181,248 acres, when, in fact, it is but the mess of pottage. Over and above that which became our own according to and under the stipulations offered us, and which we agreed to, because we had no other alternative but to submit, we have never received any thing; no, not an acre. And, sir, shall we permit the charge to go out to the world that we have received this amount as gratuitous donations, when it is altogether false? Never.

I willingly admit that donations of land have been made to several of the States. But for these they have paid you, more than doubly paid you, by their labor and the improvement of the country. Their roads and their canals, their industry and enterprise, have more than paid you in the enhancement of the value of the public lands. As was justly and unanswerably said on yesterday by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. VINTON,] the roads that have been made by the people of the new States, under the greatest disadvantages; under the disadvantages of a sparse population, and of nine tenths of the country being owned by foreigners or by the Government; and the fields that have been cleared, and the improvements that have been made, have given to your lands almost all the value which they possess. Sir, it is the fearless enterprise, the boldness and the daring of the Western man, in rescuing your lands from the savage and the beasts of the forest, that has given them value. In this they have paid you, and more than paid you, for all the donations you have made them. The difficulties incident to the settling of a new country, the Western man has met and surmounted; and after he has converted the haunts of wild beasts into abodes for civilized men, and the untamed forests into peaceful habitations, and made the country desirable and valuable by his labor, he is now to be taunted with the charge of having received exclusive benefits from his Government in the way of donations, which, if ever made, he has long since paid for.

Public Lands.

But, sir, in the consideration of this question, I take another and a higher ground. I deny the power of this Government to make the grants contemplated by the resolutions. The gentleman, in framing his resolution, saw this difficulty before him, and has endeavored to escape it by the subterfuge of making the General Government the go-between between the States who were to receive and the power that was to make the grants. The resolution reads: "But, to avoid the objection of one State holding land in another, the committee is directed to insert a clause in the bill which they may report, providing that the grants to be made thereby shall be subject to sale under the laws of the General Government now in force, and that the proceeds arising therefrom shall be paid over to the States entitled to the same." Here he attempts to make the General Government a trustee for the benefit of the States, and, in doing this, runs into the difficulty of the old question, long since settled, of dividing among the States the proceeds arising from the sales of the public lands. The gentleman, in his resolution, endeavors to occupy ground from which he can shift at pleasure, whenever it may suit his purpose. If you charge him with a proposition to give to one State lands which lie in another, he will attempt to escape from this difficulty by replying; "but the General Government is to sell the lands and pay over the proceeds." If you then charge him with a proposition, under disguise, to divide the proceeds arising from the sales of the public lands, he again replies that his resolutions were to give to the old States "such grants of the public lands, for the purposes of education, as will correspond, in a just proportion, with those heretofore made in favor of the new States." Sir, the object, the moving cause of these resolutions, is to grant away the public lands to the different States of this Union, and I shall in that way consider them.

During the revolutionary war, and immediately subsequent to it, Congress, owing to growing jealousies, and open complaints of those States which had no public domain, appealed to those which had, and besought them, for the purpose of harmony and the general good, to cede their lands to the Federal Government; and, as an inducement towards this end, Congress solemnly promised that new States should be formed out of the territory that might be ceded, and that these new States, in coming into the Union, should be as free, sovereign, and independent, as the old States. Here, sir, is a resolution on this subject, passed in October, 1780:

"Resolved, That the unappropriated lands that may be ceded or relinquished to the United States, by any particular State, pursuant to the recommendation of Congress of the 6th day of September last, shall be disposed of for the common benefit of the United States, and be settled and formed into distinct republican States, which shall become members of the Federal Union, and have the same rights of sovereignty, freedom, and independence, as the other States." Now, sir, if these States, in coming into the Union, have "the same rights of sovereignty, freedom, and independence, as the other States," what earthly power is there that can grant away to another lands lying within their limits? Such a grant would not only be against this express promise of Congress, and against the constitution of the United States, but it would be against the terms of the bond which you exacted from us. It was never contemplated in the agreements made by the States, that you should have this power; it did not enter into the understanding, it formed no part of the contract. And even had any convention been wild enough to give away this high attribute of sovereignty, the grant would have been void, because it is a power which they, about to assume the station of a free and a sovereign people, could not have parted with. It would have destroyed the object in view, and been against not only the principles of the Government, but the constitution of the country. The agreement, therefore, between the States and the Federal Government, extended only to an acknowledgment of the right of the General Government to the public domain lying within the limits of the new States, and their right to dispose of the same. The General Government, therefore, has no more right to grant away these lands to another State than they have to a foreign Power beyond the Atlantic; for, if we are free, sovereign, and independent at all, we are so to every intent and purpose, except so far as a portion of our power has been vested in the General Government for specified purposes. It was not the object of the States, in ceding these lands, that such a power should be conferred upon the General Government, nor did the General Government ever ask for these cessions upon any other considerations than those of producing harmony among the States, and of paying the debt which we had incurred by the Revolution. This is shown beyond contradiction by the resolution of Congress passed in April, 1784. I will read it:

"Resolved, That the same subject [that of ceding the public lands] be again presented to the attention of said States; that they be urged to consider that the war being now brought to a happy termination by the personal services of our soldiers, the supplies of property by our citizens, and loans of money from them as well as from foreigners, these several creditors have a right to expect that funds shall be provided, on which they may rely for indemnification; that Congress still think vacant territory as an important resource; and that, therefore, the said States be earnestly pressed, by immediate and liberal cessions, to forward these necessary ends, and to promote the harmony of the Union."

Here, sir, are the objects for which these lands were ceded, and these alone are the objects which led to the cessions. Such a monstrous and overwhelming power as that claimed by the resolutions was neither asked for nor given. The holy purposes of producing harmony in the Union, and paying the debt incurred by the Revolution, were the only considerations which prompted the States to cede their lands; and nowhere else, since the cessions were made, has this power been given; and no where can it be found, neither in the statute book, nor in the constitution, nor in the principles of the Government.

These resolutions, should they pass, would entirely revolutionize the whole land system. They would produce a new state of things, the effects of which, their bearing upon the prosperity and growth of the new States, no man can tell. No one can tell how far they would sour and irritate the feelings of the people of the new States, and impair that harmony which is the life and vigor of the Union. Already do the new States look upon your measures in relation to the public lands as rigorous and severe beyond any argument of necessity or propriety. They feel that they have been oppressed; and I would say, sir, let them not learn from your acts that this is your settled determination. It is not wise to aggravate and bear down upon the chafed and worried spirit. We are weak, and we know it; you are strong, and we feel it. The balance of political power is against us, and you can exercise it for our advancement or destruction. Let me beseech you to listen to our voice, and not to disregard our warnings. We know what we have done for the General Government. We know what services we have rendered you, what price we have paid for all the supposed or real benefits you have conferred upon us. We know that it is the axe and the rifle of the Western man that have been the means of filling your Treasury with our gold—that it is the roads we have worked, the farms we have cleared, the improvements we have made, the mills and the bridges we have erected, that have rendered your lands valuable, and made them a source of national wealth; and we claim to be heard when the subject of disposing of the public lands is agitated. We expect that our opinions and wishes shall be respected, when we, of all others, are the most deeply interested, and must be supposed to be the best acquainted with the subject. What will be the consequences, if these resolutions, addressed to the worst passions of the human heart, should be passed? Avarice that has no sympathy, and cupidity that knows no satiety, will rule the destinies of the new States. Instead of one, as at present, we shall have seventeen or eighteen masters, who, governed by a spirit of selfishness, will overlook our most sacred rights, and check our onward march to wealth and greatness, by finding an argument for the general good in every measure which will redound to their own individual interest. What can we hope for, sir, in the way of internal improvements, in the way of liberal measures, calculated to advance us in wealth and population, when we should have to convince the judgment and obtain the consent of seventeen or eighteen masters, in relation to all measures which we know would not only promote our own prosperity, but would enhance that of the whole country?

Public Lands.

Now, sir, at this time, we that are called free and sovereign States, and by your statute books are said to have "the same rights of sovereignty, freedom, and independence, as the other States," cannot make a road in our country without being trespassers, and subject to the penalties of your laws. Yes, Missouri, the free and sovereign State of Missouri, cannot make a road without violating the laws of this Union; for it is scarcely possible for her to make one, without running it over the public lands. Her Legislature, if desirous of engaging in the system of internal improvements, and about to construct great and important works, before she dare embark in it, although sovereign and free—yes, sir, sovereign and free, for so your statute book says, and which is responded to by the letter and spirit of the constitution—she must come here, and humbly supplicate this body to permit her to run her roads over the public lands! There is not a county tribunal in my State that does not, every time it sits, commit a trespass in the roads which they order to be laid out, and subject themselves to damages. And yet we are free and sovereign! What mockery! what insult! This is bad enough. But what could we expect, if the States of this Union were to have a direct interest in your public lands? We should be as lambs under the hands of the shearer. Our fate would be that of unhappy Poland, parcelled out and distributed, without sympathy or mercy, among those with whom power and right are convertible terms, and whose only spring of action, whose only views of justice, and whose only principle of right, is the cold and merciless principle of selfishness, which looks to no other beacon for its guide but the one which lights the pathway to its own aggrandizement.

But the gentleman who introduced these resolutions says his object is that justice, equal justice, shall be done to all the other States in relation to these lands. Sir, these things come with a bad grace from that gentleman. What right has Kentucky to make this demand? What right has she to talk of equal justice in distributing the public lands, when she is swollen with the wealth acquired from the lands that she claimed and sold within her own limits? How came she by these lands? What just right had she to the lands within her limits more than the other States? Sir, she came into this Union untrammelled; we came in bound hand and foot. The bond we gave was exacted from us under duress. But, I ask again, what right has Kentucky to appear here with "justice" in her mouth, when she is gorged with unrighteous wealth acquired from lands she has sold? She has had and sold her millions of acres; and to whom did she ever propose a division? When did she ever offer to be "just?" Sir, unless the gentleman's ideas of justice are altogether one-sided, I hope he will accept as a modification the resolution which I shall offer as such. But if he will not accept it, I give notice that I will offer it as soon as an opportunity occurs. In offering it, sir, I am prompted by a sense of strict justice, and also by a principle which we act upon in the West, to fight fire with fire, when the fire has seized upon and is consuming our large and extensive prairies. When its devastating flames, in rolling volumes of terrific grandeur, are rushing upon us and about to consume all that we are worth—all that we prize as sacred and hold dear—the family hearth and the cherished home—'tis then that self-preservation teaches us to burn against the raging element. The resolution which I hold in my hand is offered upon the same principle; I ask that the Clerk may read it.

The resolution is as follows:

Resolved, That such States as have heretofore appropriated lands to their own use, whether within their own limits or not, and sold the same for their own benefit, shall, before being entitled to receive any thing contemplated by these resolutions, account to the other States for the amount of money which they have so received for the sale of such lands; and, also, for such lands as still remain unsold, at the prices for which they are respectively sold in said States.

Mr. HANNEGAN was of opinion no practical good was to be obtained by the continuance of the discussion, and moved to lay the whole subject on the table.

Mr. C. ALLAN called for the yeas and nays on that motion, which were ordered; and, being taken, were: Yeas 95, nays 99, as follows:

EXECUTIVE ADMINISTRATION.

The House resumed the consideration of the resolution heretofore offered by Mr. WISE, together with the pending amendment of Mr. D. J. PEARCE, providing for the appointment of a select committee to inquire into the administration of the executive departments.

Mr. ROBERTSON concluded his remarks, as given entire in preceding pages.

Mr. HANNEGAN said: No gentleman disliked more than himself to occupy the time of the House in debate; none felt more highly the value of that time to the country at a period like the present, when, as all knew it to be, the mass of business was so accumulated and immense. For this reason, his observations would be brief. It was due to himself, however, that the occasion should not pass, that the vote he intended to give on the resolution under discussion should not be recorded, without an explanation of his reasons, to go with that vote to the constituents whose generous confidence he so deeply appreciated.

Sir, (said Mr. H.) I shall vote for the resolution, as proposed by my friend from Virginia, [Mr. WISE.] The vote, however, will not be given for the same reasons assigned a day or two since by the gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. PICKENS,] or for those given in the main by the gentleman from Virginia who had just resumed his seat, [Mr. ROBERTSON.] So far as the latter gentleman's assignment was based upon the spirit of inquiry, or the right and power of this House to investigate fully and freely, and at any moment, the affairs of the different departments and bureaus of the Government, he concurred with him to the uttermost. It was a right upon which might emphatically be said to hang the purity of the Government and the liberties of the people; a right for the exercise of which he had ever contended, in its fullest and broadest sense, and which he could not now surrender; a power which, when denied by the Bank of the United States, and its friends on that floor and elsewhere, he should, to the last hour of his life, consider as a denial of the essential principle of popular Government.

So far, however, as the gentleman's argument concerned the existence of corruption, and the practice of abuses in the different departments, the improper or unjust exercise of executive or other official influence on the politics of the day or the recent elections, and the necessity of the proposed investigation for these purposes, he differed with him in the widest sense of the word.

Neither abuses nor corruption would, as Mr. H. believed, be found existing in any of the departments; but the fuller and more open the investigations should be, the more complete, in his opinion, would be the vindication of those against whom the charges are to be levelled. That vindication was what no correct man could feel inclined to deny, if based upon justice and innocence. Regarding them in that light, he had no fears of the consequences; and should they be found otherwise, it was due to the country, to those who had been deceived, to the venerable Chief Magistrate, against whom he believed no man had ever yet directed the charge of corruption, dishonor, or dishonesty, that the guilt should be exposed, and the guilty brought to punishment. With the honorable mover of the resolution, he was willing to go every length in pursuit of the peculator and the plunderer. The cry that such were abroad, that they were fattening on the public crib, that they were hidden in the recesses of the departments, had been resounding through the hall every day since the commencement of the present, and indeed during the greater part of the last session. The public mind was constantly turned by gentlemen here to this one theme; and it seemed to him high time that all this corruption, none of which, however, he had yet heard specified, should be looked into, probed, corrected.

There was an individual, too, connected with this business, whose name, from its frequent repetition by honorable gentlemen in their places, the very parrots themselves, had they been present, would have learned to utter ere this; an individual whom he knew in private life, and knew there without reproach, yet whose name here was daily connected with the worst practices. This individual, common justice entitled at least to trial, before condemnation. Mr. H., as every body would understand, alluded to Reuben M. Whitney, the sum and substance of the charge against whom, so far as specifications went, amounted to the fact that he was employed as an agent by some of the deposit banks, his employment as an agent of the Government being presumed solely from the appearance of his name affixed to a sign before one of the rooms in the building occupied by the Treasury Department. This fact alone might, with a jury predetermined to hang both him and Mr. Woodbury, be sufficient proof; but certainly, if no such prior determination existed, it could not be construed into proof positive of a knowledge on either part that the other existed.

Justice to this individual himself, to his family, to the country, demanded an exposé of the attitude which he occupied officially towards the Government.

To the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. PEARCE] he could not accede, because in so doing the appearance might be conveyed to the malicious portion of the world, that the friends of the administration had something to dread from the broad, open scrutiny proposed by the main resolution. The effect of each, even their meaning, might be substantially the same; yet, to those who felt inclined to blacken and distort, he wished no pretext furnished for the gratification of such passions. The amendment might with some plausibility be represented as an evasion of the direct question in issue; and, for his own part, throughout life he had never sought by sinuous movements the accomplishment of any object. He could not seek by indirection that which could be attained directly.

The honorable gentleman from Rhode Island had advanced, in the course of his remarks, a constitutional opinion on the powers conferred by the resolution, from which Mr. H. must beg leave to dissent—the opinion that the resolution would violate the article in the amendments to the constitution protecting the people against unreasonable searches and seizures. To that article, in the opinion of Mr. H., but one meaning could be attached, and that so simple and plain that a misunderstanding was impossible. It applied to the people generally, in the capacity of citizens, and related only to their personal and private affairs. The contents of the executive departments were literally the property of Congress, by whose act, as the agent of the people, every thing they contained could be thrown open, and exposed to public investigation.

In replying to some of the remarks that had fallen from the gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. PICKENS,] he could not forbear to say, that however erroneous he might consider that gentleman's opinions, or whatever difference of sentiment existed between them on political subjects, there was a manliness in his tone, a fearlessness in his expression, that must command respect, even where it failed to produce conviction. He was glad to hear the explanation given by that honorable gentleman to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. ROBERTSON] of the denunciation, or rather the declaration of uncompromising war, which he had also understood him to make against the coming administration. He was rejoiced at it, for even at the time of the expression from which he had drawn the inference, it was regarded in his mind as an expression springing from the heat of the moment, in the excitement of debate, and not as the settled purpose of his heart.

The gentleman from South Carolina, in deploring what he conceives to be the fallen condition of the country, has alluded to the condition of this House, as affording ample proofs of the approaches making to despotism; the fact that the party supporting the administration has had the ascendancy here, and that their measures have been contrary to that gentleman's notions of correct policy, he has ascribed to a feeling of servility on the part of the majority towards the Executive. In his own language, the House, for the last four years, has been used as a mere registry for the royal edicts. That is, for the last four years, the majority here have done nothing but obey the will and study the wish of the President. Sir, let us inquire how far the facts sustain this broad assertion. Without enumerating the many instances in which bills, particularly those covering appropriations, have passed both this body and the other during the period mentioned, and to some of which the President, as is well known, has reluctantly affixed his signature, to others has absolutely denied his assent; without the history of all these, if the gentleman will but look back to the last session, he will find a case strong enough to convince all of the jaundiced view he has taken in this instance. The case referred to is the deposite act; a measure second in its importance only to the recharter of the United States Bank, and which, by an overwhelming majority, passed both Houses at the last session.

Had this body been such as the gentleman would describe, holding the hall as a mere registry of the royal edicts, that bill never could have become a law; for, as all knew, the President's opinions were openly adverse to the principles of that bill; and but for the amendment of this House to the bill of the Senate, by which the constitutional objection was removed, it never would have received his signature. The removal of this objection, although sufficient to avoid all collision with that high instrument, did not by any means vary the substantial principles of the bill; they still remained, and the President's opposition to the policy thus temporarily about to be established was no secret here, either with friends or foes. Yet, after all, what was the result? It was, sir, that more than three-fourths of his most decided friends in this House voted for the bill, and sustained it in every stage. Mr. H. said he would not have alluded to this particular instance, or attempted any defence of the party with which he acted, against this charge of the gentleman from South Carolina, but for the striking refutation it gave to all charges of the kind, charges of subserviency to executive will, against those who believed that Executive not immaculate, but who did believe him honest, wise, and patriotic; striving to serve his country and to preserve the purity of her institutions; and who, so believing, had sustained his measures, and stood to his support when menaced by an insulting foe from abroad, or when threatened by the insidious power of a far more dangerous enemy at home; the power of a serpent nursed to terrible maturity in the very bosom of the people, who learned, almost too late, the venom and the poison which lay hid beneath the quiet and beautiful surface.

Mr. H. said, throughout the period of this session, there was one thing he had observed with pain; a course which he believed had no precedent in the past history of the country, and the memory of which he hoped might be buried forever at the termination of this Congress. He alluded to the fact of the determined spirit of animosity, the same relentless opposition which, during the past seven years, had been exhibited in the House against the President, continuing to evince itself up to the hour when he was retiring finally from the public stage. Whatever might have been the rancor of party, he believed, from all the information he had, that the last session of an Executive had hitherto been permitted to pass, if not entirely in calmness and peace, shorn, at least, of the virulence and rancor of cherished hate. He presumed not to be a conscience-keeper for others, nor would he dictate any man's course; but were he now the enemy of the venerable man who had so long occupied a distinguished place in the eyes of his own country and the world, he could not find it in his heart, at this period, to imbitter a single breath of his allotted existence. Whatever feelings of hostility he might have cherished against the Executive himself, the policy and propriety of his administration, he would at this hour stand silently by, and permit the curtain to drop quietly and decently over the last scene. What, he asked, was that scene, and who the great actor that the curtain was about to fall upon? It was the last retiring view which the world could have of a man whose eventful life had furnished a whole, a heavy volume for the history of his country; of a man whose imperishable deeds were to be written in other languages, and read in other tongues, and never read in any land, under any sky where human liberty had a votary, without the heartfelt tribute of glowing admiration; a man upon whom his country, almost with acclamation, had delighted to bestow the highest honors of the State, and who wore those honors as became them both, his only aim her glory, her prosperity, her happiness, her liberty.

Let the records of his renown be sought where they may, whether emanating from the closet or achieved in the field, they will be found alike stamped with the impress of a mighty mind, a patriotic and devoted heart. No matter in what manner he may be talked of here, what obloquy may be cast upon his acts, it will turn to nothing in the end. The glories of New Orleans, of Talladega, of the Horseshoe, cannot be stricken from the annals of American history. Posterity will read; and, in aftertimes, when patriots war for liberty, amid the strife, the hurry, and the carnage, the name of Andrew Jackson shall be the talisman,

"To stir the hearts of men
As though 'twere the battle drum."

Long hence, when the rank grass shall have grown, and withered again and again, over the whole "animated warm motion" now filling this hall, when perhaps none will be found to tell where most of us lie; in this very hall, if liberty and union remain, the name he had just uttered would be heard resounding, as the preserver, in a trying hour, of his country's political freedom and the pure principles of her constitution.

Mr. H. said he was not speaking with a courtier's tongue, for such a language he had yet to learn, or such a feeling to cherish, towards created man. It was not the part he had played in his intercourse with the President; but whenever, as had sometimes been the case, a difference of opinion existed between them on subjects in which he himself had felt an interest, his own opinions had been spoken to the President promptly and warmly, it might be at times too warmly for the disparity of years. In speaking of the Executive now, he had spoken of him as one about to be numbered with the past; as one with whom his own age was on the eve of exchanging mournful adieus, and upon whose ear the voice alike of flattery and of friendship, of low detraction and of manly enmity, would soon fall with the same heavy, cold, senseless effect.

From first to last, since his entry into the hall, he had sat and silently heard the President denounced as a tyrant, branded, almost in the same breath, with the opposite epithets of usurper and dotard. Fortunately the feelings which inspired such language could not be communicated to posterity; they would sink into the same grave, they would lie buried in the same oblivion, assigned to most of those who cherished them.

History, in her long drawn gallery, will present to coming time no portrait that can occupy a higher place than his who in life has been so traduced—none that shall stand forth in more simple, beautiful, living relief.

The gentleman from South Carolina, in the course of his remarks, had drawn a comparison, as Mr. H. understood him at the time, between the President and the Roman Sylla and Marius, and the English Cromwell—between Andrew Jackson and the cold, cruel, fanatical Cromwell! the usurper, who rushed undismayed over the rights and liberties of the very people to whom he owed every thing save his existence, to seize upon a blood-stained protectorate.

[Mr. PICKENS here asked the floor, which was yielded, and then stated that the application of his remarks had been misunderstood by Mr. H.; that his intention was not to institute the comparisons as supposed; that, in his remarks referring to the tribunes of the Roman people, and not to Sylla and Marius, as Mr. H. supposed, and in his reference to the course and character of Oliver Cromwell, he had simply meant to be understood as comparing the condition of our country with theirs; and our downward course to the same despotism, should we, under the coming administration, find that the fundamental principles of the constitution had been undermined, by a precedent established of executive interference in the successionship.]

Mr. H. continued. He was gratified to be informed of his misunderstanding of the gentleman's allusion. In support of the fundamental principles of the constitution, that gentleman could not go further than he was willing to go. There was no sacrifice he would not be proud to make, no tie he would not freely sever, to preserve from violation that sacred charter. As to the character of Mr. Van Buren's administration, not having the gift of prescience, it was impossible for him to say what might be its results. He looked forward, however, with perfect confidence, to a continuance of the principles upon which the Government was now administered, and felt satisfied that, in this expectation, there would be no disappointment. That violence could be offered, that a blow could be inflicted upon the fundamental principles of the constitution by the present head of the Government, was a state of things which he could not conceive within the range of possibility. It would argue an unhallowed love of power, and a misapprehension or a hatred of the free institutions of his native soil, in the bosom of the man. Is it, he would ask, likely that such feelings could now tenant the heart of Andrew Jackson? He would let the terms in which his friend from Tennessee [Mr. PERRY] had spoken of the President, a few days back, answer the question. He alluded to the interview described by his friend between the President and one of the Tennessee Senators. Was he planning schemes of power for himself or another, then? Was their talk of treason or unholy stratagem? No, sir, no; the gentleman from Tennessee told us it was of the grave—of dying—of his loved Hermitage, which he wished once more to see, and where he hoped his eyes might close. Can it be that such a man, after having toiled in the cause of liberty his whole life, should, when the grave and all its mysteries are drawing nigh, seek, as the last act of a glorious career, to impair the principles for which in boyhood he bled; the institutions which in riper years he aided to strengthen and perfect; and the free Government which, in the full maturity of manhood, he triumphantly sustained? Let it not be borne upon the winds; before such things can exist, the moral order of nature must be reversed.

When Mr. HANNEGAN had concluded,

Mr. HAMER rose and addressed the Chair as follows:

Mr. Speaker: It is a fact well known to every gentleman who has been an observer of the signs of the times for a few years past, that the speeches delivered here have considerable effect upon the public mind. It is right that they should. The members sent here are presumed to have some knowledge of the nature of our Government, of the interests of the country, and of the manner in which the Government is administered. What they publicly declare, under such circumstances, in their places, under official and personal responsibilities, deserves to have an influence upon their own immediate constituents and upon the public at large.

For three years past, I have frequently listened to speeches, made by gentlemen in the opposition, which I thought, at the time, deserved replies. Others thought differently, and they were permitted to pass unnoticed. Some of these speeches contained the slang and falsehoods of letter-writers and unprincipled editors, polished and endorsed by the orator, and sent out to poison and mislead the public mind with regard to those who are in power.

Some of us have thought we ought not to answer them, because it would occupy too much time. It was believed that we ought to transact the public business, and go home. I am as much opposed to the long desultory debates that occur here, involving the presidential and every other question before the country, as any one else. We carry these things so far that it has been remarked by more than one intelligent citizen that the House of Representatives was becoming a mere debating society—a club for the discussion of political questions. My opinion is, that we ought first to transact the public business, and then, if we have time to spare, let us debate these topics. The affairs of our constituents should be first attended to. It was for that they sent us here, and, when the duty is discharged, it is time enough to engage in making political harangues. But, instead of this, we waste the commencement and the middle of the session—nay, almost the whole period—with such debates; and, near the close of it, take up and pass some fifty or a hundred bills, decapitate a hundred more without much examination, and then adjourn. This, in my estimation, is all wrong. But what is to be gained by our remaining silent? If we do not debate, the opposition will. The time is consumed, and the vocabulary of our language ransacked for opprobrious epithets, to be heaped upon the Executive, upon this House, and upon the constituents who sustain both. Corruption, fraud, tyrant, usurper, slaves, are familiar terms here.

These charges are made day after day, and remain uncontradicted, to go out to the country and circulate among the people. Are these charges true or false? That "silence gives consent" is an old maxim, which has much truth in it. The frequent repetition of these charges by the opposition, and the silence of the friends of the administration, will induce some portion of the country to believe them. If they are true, we ought to admit them; if not, we should pronounce them false. So far as I know or believe, they are false, and I therefore pronounce them so before the country.

Executive Administration.

No one word is heard oftener in our debates here than the word "party!" The opposition gentlemen seem to be peculiarly fond of it. They are constantly appealing to us to disregard party considerations, and go for the country.

There are parties in all free Governments. They arise from a difference of opinion among men in regard to the policy to be pursued by those who are intrusted with the administration of public affairs. Candidates, holding to opposite principles, present themselves for public favor, and the people decide between them. In other countries, especially in England, one party is said to be out of power, and the other in, as the one or the other may happen to be successful. It was formerly so here. At one time the federal party was in power, and at another time the republican or democratic party. But for a few years past a different mode of expression has been adopted. The opposition claim to be "the country," and denounce us as "a party!" We, who have been in power for eight years; we, who elect the President and sustain him and his administration, by the votes of a large majority of the American people; we, forsooth, are "a party," whilst a minority, struggling in vain to obtain the control of the Government, impudently claim to be the country!

Now, there never can be a universal concurrence of opinion with respect to public men and public measures; and when the question has been fairly presented to the people, and a majority decide either one way or the other, that decision is virtually the voice of the country. Such a decision has been made. It was announced in 1828, and has remained unreversed until this time. We are the country, and have been during all that period. If there are either "parties" or "factions" in the case, they are to be found among those who manifest violent and persevering opposition to the will of the majority—a will so distinctly and repeatedly expressed by the sovereign people of the United States.

I have no disposition to fight the presidential campaign over again upon this floor; to imitate the old soldier, who shouldered his crutch, and showed how fields were won. But as reviewing seems to be the order of the day, and it has become very unfashionable to speak to the subject before the House, I will look back to some of the topics which have been introduced into this debate, as well as others that have taken place here.

It has been quite common for the last three years to hear the President pronounced a usurper and a tyrant. Grecian, Roman, and English history have all been put in requisition, and carefully examined, from beginning to end, for the purpose of finding parallels and illustrations of his cruelty, tyranny, and usurpation. It is an easy matter to make these comparisons, and to call hard names. It requires very little talent and less reading. But gentlemen should remember that declamation is not argument; and that assertion is not proof. If these parallels are just, it must be within the power of those who use them to point to the facts which render the President obnoxious to the charges preferred against him. Why are they not given? In what particular has he violated either law or constitution? Let them name the instance, and give us the circumstances. General, indiscriminate condemnation will not satisfy the American people. When the cases are specified, it will be matter for investigation and argument whether they sustain the accusations so confidently made by his antagonists. Until then, I, for one, shall consider it as mere idle declamation.

I do not stand here to pronounce a eulogium upon the President. His acts are before his country, and they have already, in the presence of his accusers, rendered a verdict of unqualified approbation upon his public career. What motive can he have to infringe upon the liberties of his fellow-citizens, or to overturn the constitution of his country? None. His countrymen have conferred upon him every favor in their gift, and he has attained the highest station which human power can bestow. From that station he is about to retire, leaving his country happy and prosperous beyond example, and attended by the benedictions of a just and grateful people.

But I will not enter upon his defence. If I were inclined to do so, under other circumstances, I have been saved the necessity of discharging this duty by the able and eloquent speech of my friend from Indiana, [Mr. HANNEGAN,] who has just taken his seat. He has treated this subject so much more ably than I could hope to do, that I will not attempt to tread upon the ground he has already occupied.

Can any one fail to see why it is that these unfounded charges are so often repeated? Those who have studied the nature of the human mind are aware of the influence made upon it by repeated blows, followed up from time to time with untiring perseverance. This everlasting hammering in the same place will ultimately produce its effect upon the hardest material; and assaults made upon individual character, whether public or private, from day to day, for a series of years, if uncontradicted, will finally gain credence even among a man's friends. This is the secret of the merciless warfare which has been carried on against President Jackson.

Another fruitful topic of discussion with the opposition is the inconsistency of the President and his friends in regard to the great questions of policy that have been agitated before the country for some years past. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. ROBERTSON] has adverted to this contrariety of opinion.

[Mr. ROBERTSON arose, and said that the gentleman from Ohio had misapprehended him. He did not speak of the differences of principle among the friends of the administration. He had said nothing of the terrible federalists they had in their ranks, nor of the discordant materials that composed their party; but he had attempted to show that the President was inconsistent with himself; that, from his own acts and communications, he might be claimed as the friend or enemy of the tariff, internal improvements, the bank, &c.]

Mr. H. said he accepted the gentleman's statement with pleasure; he had no doubt misapprehended the tenor of his observations. But he would tell the gentleman that, with regard to "terrible federalists," if he wanted to find them of the real black-cockade stamp of 1800, he might readily do so, and that in great numbers, among his own political associates. He believed the gentleman had never belonged to that school; but there were many of them among those who co-operated with him against the administration. The old black-cockade party, and their regular descendants and successors, who held the same doctrines, formed no small portion of the opposition. Look, said he, at Massachusetts, so highly complimented the other day by the honorable gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. PICKENS,] and you may there see on what side the remnant of the old federalists of 1798 are to be found.

On this subject of the tariff, as well as upon several others, there is an old proverb which I can recommend to the consideration of gentlemen in the opposition. I know it is said by Lord Chesterfield and others to be rather vulgar to quote proverbs, but I confess I like them. Proverbs are usually the result of the accumulated experience of successive generations of men. In nineteen cases out of twenty they are true. It is their truth which preserves them; if false, they would be forgotten. The one to which I allude is, that "those who live in glass houses ought not to throw stones."

Executive Administration.

[H. OF R.]

Do we differ in regard to the doctrine of a protective tariff? Pray, what are the sentiments of the opposition upon this subject? Have they any principle in common with regard to protection? What is it? Ask the nullifiers, the people of what is called (and I think she has earned the title here, if nowhere else) the gallant little State of South Carolina. Why, sir, it is but a short time since they were willing to peril every thing, union itself, rather than submit to a protective tariff—to a “bill of abominations.” They deny the power of Congress to pass any such law, and hold all such enactments to be open violations of the constitution. But what say the opposition in the North and West? What are the sentiments of the “American system” men on this subject? They believe that the Federal Government not only has the authority to pass such laws, but that it is a solemn duty we owe our country to afford them this protection. These are the gentlemen who are so grievously offended at the want of consistency among the friends of the administration!

How is it in respect to internal improvements under the authority of the General Government? Here there is a like inconsistency amongst our political opponents. In the South and Southwest, the power to construct roads and canals is most strenuously denied; but in the North and West it is almost universally claimed and conceded. It is with one portion of the country a most radical error to attempt the exercise of this authority, whilst in another region it is a part of the constitutional duty of the functionaries here to make large appropriations for this purpose. What a delightful harmony there would be among such gentlemen, if they were in power, and had control of the finances of the country! What discussions we should hear among themselves upon the constitutionality and wisdom of such appropriations! It would be the music of the spheres; a concord of sweet sounds. Their President would have no difficulty whatever in adopting a line of policy which would receive the unanimous support of all his party.

Another very important subject involved in the political contests of the last three or four years is the Bank of the United States. What are the sentiments of the opposition with regard to this institution? As variant as the colors of the rainbow. The strict constructionists in the South deny the power of Congress to create such a corporation. Some hold that, if they had the power, it would be inexpedient to exercise it; and others that it would be excellent policy to create a bank with proper limitations. Another class believe the power exists, but that its exertion would be dangerous to public liberty; whilst the real “Simon Pure,” thorough-going bankites, not only claim the authority, but insist that such a bank is indispensably necessary, as a great balance-wheel to regulate the currency and control the fiscal operations of the country. These are the men who are never weary in the discharge of their duty. They go about day and night, crying “distress, ruin, bankruptcy, and wretchedness,” to alarm and terrify the people with supposed dangers just before them, which are, in fact, never to be realized. No man can receive their votes for President, unless they believe he will lend his influence to the establishment of a great national bank. This is, with them, “the very bottom and the soul of hope.” Which side would prevail in the new administration? Would the Executive be for a bank or against it? No mortal man can solve this problem. Not a man in the opposition will attempt to answer the question.

Again, sir, we are told that the present Executive came into power under pledges to produce important reforms; that “retrenchment and reform” was the motto of the party who elected him; and that the “reforms” have not been made. Pray, what are the reforms which deserve our attention? Are there any useless offices that ought to be abolished? If so, name them. Does any officer receive too large a compensation? Let us know it. Are there any changes necessary in the organization of the departments, or in the laws regulating the action of particular bureaux? Point them out. I will go heart and hand with any gentleman for whatever is proper to be done in regard to these matters, and I dare say there will be a general co-operation on the part of my political friends in so laudable an undertaking. Let gentlemen either propose something as proper to be done, let them at least point out the evil, or cease their everlasting clamor about the violation of pledges on our part. How can reforms be made where every thing is already perfect? What surgeon amputates a sound limb? Who administers medicine to a person in the vigor of manhood, and perfectly free from disease? If there be either wound or blemish in the system, let it be made known; and we, who possess the law-making power, should forthwith provide a remedy.

“Proscription” is one of the topics upon which the opposition delight to expatiate. It is of two kinds, according to their account of it: first of public officers, and secondly of the minority as a mass. As to the first, it is said that all are removed who are not of the dominant party; that none can be appointed who are not of the same faith; and that the road to honor and emolument is thus closed up to the minority entirely. A more unfounded charge than this was never made against any party of men since the world began. Why, sir, a majority of the offices in this city, held under the Executive of the United States, are now, and have been for eight years, in the hands of opposition men. Whilst this charge is repeated here from day to day, and reiterated by political partisans from one end of the continent to the other, the opposition clerks are quietly receiving their salaries in the different departments, receiving and holding their respective appointments from the President of the United States and the members of his cabinet!

Is it otherwise in regard to the post offices? I know that in my region of country a large majority of the offices are in the hands of the opposition. I believe it is so throughout the United States, if we take the whole number of offices connected with that department. So you may find hundreds in the custom-houses of the same political faith, enjoying the favor of this administration. What becomes of the charge, then, that no one can hold office but a democrat? It vanishes before the sunlight of truth, leaving not a trace upon the surface where it so lately rested.

The proscription of the minority en masse is a subject I have never been able to comprehend. How are they proscribed? Do they not enjoy all the rights and immunities guaranteed to other citizens? Have they been disfranchised? What privilege has been taken away? Are not the courts open to them for redress of their grievances? Are not their persons, reputations, and property, protected by law like those of other citizens? If so, of what do they complain? Why, they cannot get office!

This brings me to the consideration of the 100,000 office-holders, who are said to have been sustaining the administration for some time past, and to have conducted the campaign in favor of Mr. Van Buren. I can remember when I believed there was something in this story about the office-holders sustaining Mr. Van Buren, and being his principal supporters. It was asserted in that bold and confident tone which we so frequently listen to here, and I took it for granted gentlemen would not say so in that manner, unless it was well established. I have been deceived in that way more than once. Gentlemen rise and tell us that the South will do this, and the North will not do that, in a tone of authority that leads a young man, inexperienced in the ways of the Capitol, to believe they are authorized to speak for the whole scope of country indicated in their remarks. It is not so. I am older now, and understand these things. I have been behind the curtain here, which excludes our doings from the eyes of the American people; and when I hear and see these things, I attach just so much weight to them as they deserve. Such asseverations are often made by gentlemen who, no doubt, believe them to be true, but who know no more about it than I do. Experience has shown that, in more than one instance, they were mistaken.

Gentlemen seem to forget that, besides these offices held under the Federal Government, there are more than a hundred thousand held under the State Governments. Indeed, to make up the number of a hundred thousand under the former, I believe they count the army and navy of the United States, and all the pensioners! By what authority are they set down as friends of the administration? Who asserts that these men, who receive the sums paid to them under the law, and not by the favor of the Executive, are less free than their fellow-citizens? How are they dependent on the President for support? They are no more so than any other citizen of the country. But suppose what is said of them to be true, we all know that the State, county, city, town, and township officers exercise much more influence over the public mind than they do. Who has most influence over his neighbors, the sheriff of the county, the associate judges, where there are such officers, or a postmaster in some little town? The former, unquestionably. And, pray, who holds these offices in all the States, counties, and towns, in which the opposition have the political power? Their friends, in almost every instance. In what places do they vote for democrats, in preference to men of their own party? In none that have come within the range of my observation. Have they any right to complain that we prefer our friends to our enemies, (and that is the proscription of which they complain,) when they do the very same thing themselves? They vote against men, and thus "proscribe them for opinion's sake." They will not allow them to hold office; and the only reason assigned is, that they do not like their political opinions. All parties do this. It is in the nature of man to sustain his friends, and to rally around those who agree with him in sentiment.

We are charged with being influenced by the "spoils," and with relying upon them to insure our success. By "spoils" they mean either office or money. In regard to the former, the opposition claim a remarkable share of disinterested patriotism. If we believe their account of it, they have a great aversion to office; and yet, when did they ever let a good one pass by without grasping at it? I can imagine I almost see their "mouths water" sometimes for a taste of the "Treasury pap!"

If it had so happened that Mr. Van Buren had not received quite votes enough to elect him, and the three highest candidates had come before the House for our decision, we should have had great difficulty in arriving at a conclusion. There would have been no intrigue or bargain, of course! But when all the difficulties had been surmounted, as they no doubt would have been, and an opposition man elected, then we should have seen the beginning of troubles. What would have been the policy of his administration no man living can tell. His supporters would have been of all political creeds and complexions under heaven; as opposite to each other as the poles, and wholly irreconcilable. He could not have pleased one set of them without displeasing the others; and if he had compromised, and gone sometimes a little with one side, and then leaned a little to the other, he would have been doing precisely what they charge upon General Jackson, and would therefore have displeased them all!

But this is not the grand difficulty. We are told that professions and practice ought to go together. Now, the opposition profess to believe that our friends who are in office are unworthy to remain there; so they should be turned out forthwith. Again, they profess to have a mortal hatred for office-holders; and, of course, none of them would be willing to fill the vacancies! Here would be one of the greatest calamities that ever befel a free people—all the offices of the country vacant, and no one to fill them! One portion of the country would be too bad, and the other too good, to have any thing to do with public office, honor, or emolument!

But upon the subject of money, of mercenary motives and influences, who has shown the strongest inclination to resort to such means to control public sentiment? Who are the friends of banks, of the Bank of the United States? Who are willing to sell extraordinary privileges for bonuses payable in money? Who are the supporters of land bills and distribution bills? I do not speak of the deposite bill of the last session. That was sustained by a majority of my own political friends, driven to it, in some measure, by the force of circumstances, which they could not fully control; but I allude to a permanent system, by which money for which the Government has no use is to be drawn from the pockets of the people; and, after paying four or five sets of public men for collecting it, for legislating upon the subject, and for distributing it again, we return to the State Governments the balance, to be expended in such manner as they may direct. The General Government has no right to do this—it is a fraud upon the people. The revenue should be cut down so as to meet the wants of the Government, and nothing more; leaving all the fruits of individual industry beyond that in the people's pockets, to be disposed of as each man may think proper. Such is the democratic doctrine; but the opposition will not go for this.

The indications have been already given to the country. There is to be a coalition between a portion of the South and the manufacturing interests of the North. The preservation of the "public faith" is to be the pretext for collecting a surplus. The "compromise bill" is said to have pledged the public faith! What an absurdity is this! Sir, I would regard a violation of the faith of the nation with as much horror as any gentleman in or out of this House. A nation without faith is like an individual whose reputation has been totally destroyed; they are both very properly excluded from all honorable associations. But how has public faith been pledged in this case? Can two or three prominent members of Congress make an arrangement, and obtain the passage of a law which is to bind all posterity? Have they any more power than their successors; and, if so, whence did they obtain it? The idea is preposterous. If they could bind us for ten years, they can do so for fifty or a hundred; and what becomes of popular liberty? The "compromise act" is of no more authority than any other law of Congress, and can be repealed or modified at any time we may think proper. It will be sustained, however, I have no doubt, and an enormous amount of taxes thus levied upon the people, to be divided out again; keeping up swarms of unnecessary officers, and enriching one portion of the community at the expense of another. The money is never returned to the men who earned it.

Again: it is charged upon this administration that it has increased the annual expenditures to a large amount. Why do not gentlemen have the candor to tell the people the cause of this increase? It is to be found in the increased population, offices, and wants of the Government; in the appropriations for various national objects, fortifications, navy, &c. The removal of the Indian tribes west of the Mississippi, the purchase of their lands, and the wars we have had with them, are some of the principal items. Has there been any unnecessary expenditure? If so, point it out. Let us know what it is; and then we will ask ourselves why we appropriated the money.

So of the corruption of which we hear so much. In what does it consist? Who has been guilty of it? In what department or bureau is it to be found? What is its character? General charges are easily made; but they are too indefinite. Let gentlemen assume the responsibility of making a distinct charge. In private life, if one man instigates a prosecution against another for an offence, and it turns out, upon investigation, that there is no foundation for it, and not even a probable cause for its commencement, the prosecutor is liable to an action of damages for the injury done to individual reputation. Are the characters of public men less valuable to them than those of private citizens? Are they not equally under the protection of the law? True, the prosecutor here might not be liable to an action; but if there should turn out to be neither ground for the charge, nor good reason for instituting the inquiry, public sentiment would render that justice to all concerned that is administered in the other case by the Judiciary of the country.

If any gentleman will rise in his place, and state that he has good reason to believe, from information upon which he can rely, that fraud and corruption do exist in a particular department, either naming his informant or stating that it is improper to name him, I, for one, will vote for a committee, with ample powers to make a thorough investigation. If one committee is not enough, I will vote for more—for as many as are necessary to develop the true condition of the public offices, and to expose all the defaulters who may be found in them. This, I think, ought to satisfy the most fastidious.

This House has been assailed. It has been denominated a mere "bed of justice, to register the decrees of royalty!" It seems that we sit here, without any opinions of our own, merely to register the edicts of the President! What is the pretext for this charge? Why, forsooth, we agree in sentiment with the President, and therefore sustain his measures! Was ever argument more futile! Who elected the President? The people. Who elected the members of this House? The same people. Do they not vote for both because they approve of their political opinions? Undoubtedly. Are not the President and the majority of the members of this House of the same political party? Is it strange that they should agree in regard to great leading measures of policy? Who would anticipate any thing else than an agreement? I desire to speak respectfully of arguments advanced here, and will therefore not say that this is childish, but really it is one of the strangest specimens of parliamentary logic that I have ever heard.

Pray, who rules the opposition? Whose edicts do they register? Do they sit here to register the edicts of a distinguished gentleman from Kentucky, of another from Massachusetts, and of a third from South Carolina? If not, how does it happen that they agree so cordially and entirely with the three great leaders in all their political opinions? The fact cannot be denied that this agreement does exist; and if the argument is good with respect to us, it applies equally to the opposition. If we are the President's "slaves," they are "slaves" to the opposition leaders.

The President, it is said, is popular; that he rules the country and guides public sentiment by the aid of this personal popularity. What a lame and impotent conclusion! True, he is popular, but it is because he deserves to be so, from his eminent talents, his democratic principles, and his faithful and extraordinary public services. If other gentlemen wish to be popular, let them pursue his footsteps, adopt his principles, and render such services, and then they will attain the object of their wishes. The people of this country have but one desire in regard to public affairs—it is to see their Government well administered. They elected Andrew Jackson because they believed he would thus administer the Government, and they have not been disappointed.

Who is it that complains of him? They are the men who told us, in 1824 and in 1828, that if Jackson succeeded the country would be ruined; the men who told us the same thing in 1832; men who invoke war, pestilence, and famine, rather than devotion to military glory; but who, during the late campaign, huzzaed for military chieftains louder than ever we did at any period. They are now endeavoring to convince us that they were right; that we have been ruined; and that all their predictions have been verified. Do they think we will believe their declamation in opposition to the evidence of our own senses? When was this country ever more happy and prosperous than at this moment? Never since the Government was first organized. The laboring classes of the community—the farmer, the planter, the mechanic, the manufacturer—are all growing rich. Land, and all its products, bear a higher price than they have for many years; yet gentlemen will have it that we are ruined. The laws protect every man in the enjoyment of all his rights—personal liberty, personal security, and private property; in all his immunities and privileges—religious, civil, and political; still gentlemen insist that we are ruined. Sir, the people will not believe them. When they feel themselves happy at home, and learn from every intelligent American, of every party, that our country now stands higher abroad, on account of the manner in which our intercourse has been conducted by this administration with foreign nations (France included) than it ever did in any former period, they will not believe any man who asserts that they have been injured by those who have held the reins of power for the last eight years.

[Here Mr. H. gave way to Mr. ANTHONY, on whose motion the House adjourned. The subject did not come up again until the following Tuesday, when Mr. H. concluded his remarks, as follows:]

Before I resume the thread of my discourse, I must submit a few observations with regard to what fell from me the other day, when I addressed the House. I know how easy it is for what is said here to be misunderstood and misrepresented; and it appears that my positions have been greatly misunderstood by some who heard me.

It is said that I demanded specific charges of fraud before I would vote for a committee of inquiry. Not so, sir; I require some gentleman to assume the responsibility of pointing to the department, bureau, or office, where the fraud is to be found, and of asserting in his place that he has good reasons for believing it exists. Then I will vote promptly for an investigation.

Sir, I have been understood to say that those now in power are not a party. I said no such thing. The country is divided into parties, and perhaps always will be; and one of those parties is now in power. What I complain of is, that the opposition, who are in a minority, and have been for years, should arrogantly claim that they are the country, and we but a party. I insist that, if any party can be called "the country," it is ours; for in a free country the voice of the majority is virtually the voice of the country.

Again, sir, I stated that I had been behind the curtain since I came here, and had been undeceived with regard to many operations of public men. I directly referred to this House, and to the schemes and plans concocted and carried into execution by those who oppose the administration. I spoke of the curtain which conceals us from the scrutiny of the people who are at home, and who are often imposed upon most shamefully by what is put forth from this "ten miles square." For example, how often do we see an account given by a letter-writer of the speeches made here, which is a tissue of misrepresentation from beginning to end? A friend of the administration rises, perhaps, and makes a speech. That is put down as a feeble effort; contradictory, illogical, and all that. Then an opposition gentleman arose, and he literally flayed the other alive. Poor fellow, he looked as if he would sink through the floor. The writer almost fancied he could hear him groan audibly, such was the agony he felt and manifested. Now, those of us who are here "behind the curtain" understand all this; and the people at home are beginning to understand it too, though for a long time they did not. We know that these men are paid to abuse one side and praise the other, and that they are merely laboring in their vocation.

It has been alleged that I justified the President's inconsistency by charging like conduct upon his opponents. I did not undertake to argue that point at all; but I take occasion now to deny that the inconsistencies charged upon him do exist in point of fact.

So of the proscription and patronage, which furnish themes of endless declamation: I am understood to justify the one and to disregard the other, because of the existence of the same things in the States where the opposition have the power.

[Here Mr. PICKENS rose and inquired if Mr. H. meant to include South Carolina. To which Mr. H. replied in the affirmative. Mr. P. stated that the gentleman's information was incorrect; for the dominant party there had not proscribed and removed their political opponents. Mr. P. made a similar statement in regard to Massachusetts.]

Mr. H. then proceeded. I am glad to hear that our opponents are so liberal in South Carolina and Massachusetts. But the gentlemen have not given to the term proscription the same meaning that I do. It means, in plain English, as I understand it, a preference of our friends to our enemies. This preference exists in all parties, and is right in itself. Qualifications being equal, or nearly so, I would always prefer my friend to my political antagonist. No party has ever shown a more rigid adherence to this principle than the various parties opposed to the administration; and I believe it is so in both South Carolina and Massachusetts. We see very few Jackson men in Congress from either of those States, and that alone proves what I say. Removals cannot take place where there is nobody to remove; and I presume there were but few of them in office in either State.

As to removals from office, it is enough for me to repeat that the charges against the Executive are not sustained by the facts; and I appeal to the departments in this city, and to the post offices throughout the Union, to prove the unjustness of the imputation that men are removed merely on account of their political sentiments.

When we show that the opposition prefer men of their own party to others, we may then fairly and properly ask, what would the people gain upon this point by turning out the dominant party and putting in their opponents? When the raven chides blackness, is it not fair to point to the color of his own plumage? If "Satan undertakes to reprove sin," is it not well to remind him that his own moral character does not stand very fair in the community? And if politicians make furious charges against their opponents, may we not remind them that they are guilty of the very same thing themselves which they charge upon others?

Having said thus much in explanation, I will now proceed with my discourse. When we adjourned the other day, I was remarking that the nation had approved of the conduct of the present Executive. The late elections prove that beyond all dispute. A successor has been elected by a large majority, who has been associated with the Executive for many years; who approves of his leading measures, and is pledged to carry out his policy. The gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. WISE,] who I regret to see is not in his seat, particularly as I understand he is detained from it by the illness of his family, told us the other day that he was advocating the cause of the people, and did not wish to be understood as assailing the President. That gentleman and several others have been advocating the cause of the people in the same way for years; yet, whenever the people come to the polls, they uniformly decide against their own advocates, and in favor of Andrew Jackson! This proves their approbation of his principles and policy.

I do not stand here to eulogize the President, but into much I will say: when the passions which enter into party conflicts in this country shall have subsided, when the prejudices created by such controversies shall have passed away, then, and not till then, will justice be done to the fame and character of Andrew Jackson. And when his enemies shall have floated down the stream of time into that oblivion which is the inevitable destiny of almost their whole number, his memory will survive and flourish in the hearts of a just, a grateful, and an intelligent people.

The history of America up to this period will present three Presidents standing out boldly upon her pages as great public benefactors. They are—George Washington, who harmonized the conflicting elements, and put our Government in motion; Thomas Jefferson, who arrested it in its downhill career towards monarchy, and restored it to its pristine purity; and Andrew Jackson, who gave it the "republican tuck," brought it back to the point where Jefferson left it, and where it ought always to remain.

I come now to speak of the future. It has been boldly proclaimed here by several gentlemen, that, in regard to the administration of Mr. Van Buren, we are to have "war in advance," and "war to the knife!" This is a most extraordinary position for gentlemen to assume, before the principles or policy of the Chief Magistrate are made known, nay, before he has taken the oath of office; to declare war, and that, too, a war of extermination! They inform us that he is not to be judged by his acts; that they may possibly support his measures, but they will wage an interminable warfare against the man! Why, sir, we go for measures, and men to carry them out; we support men, because they are in favor of certain doctrines and measures, not because we like the man. Any other system than this must degenerate into mere "man worship."

This may be a very patriotic position; but it appears to me to be an impolitic one for the gentlemen themselves. When one man is determined beforehand to be displeased, or to quarrel with another, we know how easy it is to find an opportunity of doing so. Now, if it should so happen, in the progress of events, that these gentlemen find it necessary at some future time to make an assault upon the administration, will not the people be inclined to reply: "Ah! we did not expect you to be satisfied, for you were determined to be displeased, let the President do as he might." But the course which gentlemen choose to pursue is somewhat a matter of taste; and I have not the least desire to dictate to any one upon this subject.

If the opposition have solemnly resolved that we shall have another four years' war; if they will agree to no cessation of hostilities; if we cannot be permitted even to go into winter quarters for three months; if war, and war to the knife, is to be their motto, for one, I say, "come on, Macduff!" Let us hear the roar of your cannon, gentlemen. Show us the size of your balls; the length and diameter of your calibers. Let us hear the trampling of the horses' hoofs, the neighing of the steeds, and the clangor of your trumpets. Do not annoy us by the random shots of single riflemen from behind the scattering trees, nor by the flanking and scouting parties that belong to your army, but charge with all your forces. Danger is always increased, in appearance, by the distance. The enemy presents a much more terrifying aspect when he first bursts upon the view than when you grapple with him, man to man, and test the power of his muscle and the fierceness of his spirit. Give us a general fire, along your whole line. The suspense which precedes a great battle is the most dreadful period of the whole affair. I am told that even cowards will fight after the first discharge; and I promise you that all of us who survive the first shock will stand up and give you a fair fight in the open plain.

The reason assigned for making war upon Mr. Van Buren is, that he is a usurper! Yes, sir, although elected by the people of the United States, he is a usurper. Language is changing its meaning now-a-days, and we shall soon be unable to understand each other. Let us look into this charge.

We all know there were many persons in the democratic party who did not prefer Mr. Van Buren to all others as the successor of General Jackson. Some of us preferred Judge McLean; some were for Colonel Benton; others were for Judge White; and many were in favor of the honorable gentleman from Kentucky, (Colonel Johnson.) He was not my first choice. Thousands of us in Ohio preferred a distinguished citizen of our own State. We knew him personally; we had seen the zeal, industry, and ability, displayed by him in the management of an important Department of the Government, and in the discharge of every duty devolving upon him in the various stations he had held, both under the State and Federal authorities. We believed he would make an excellent Chief Magistrate; whilst, on the other hand, some of us had been induced to believe that, although Mr. Van Buren possessed great abilities and experience, still he was an intriguing politician. We believed so because we heard these things said, day after day, for years, and scarcely ever heard a word said in his defence. How could any one expect us, under such circumstances, to come to a favorable conclusion in regard to him? I must here beg pardon of the House for speaking particularly of myself. When I was first elected to Congress, I was elected as a McLean man. Myself and one of my colleagues were well known, both at home and at this place, to be favorable to the Judge, whilst the other friends of the administration from Ohio were either for Mr. Van Buren or uncommitted.

During the first session we were here, a convention of the Jackson party was held, at which they nominated Mr. Van Buren for President, thus crowding Judge McLean off the track in Ohio. It was a matter of public notoriety among those who took any interest in my opinions, that, judging from the information I received with regard to this proceeding, the manner of getting up and conducting the convention, I at that time disapproved it, though subsequent information changed my opinions. I wrote three letters, expressive of my disapprobation—private, confidential letters, so marked upon their face. Two were written to a gentleman long since deceased, and the other to an individual still living. Both these persons were Jackson McLean men, and my personal friends. During the campaign last fall, these letters, with the word "private" and the names of the correspondents erased, and with what other alterations, if any, I know not, appeared in the public newspapers. The living correspondent denied having any thing to do with the publication, and the family of the deceased had no participation in it. A few "whigs," with two or three professed Van Buren men, I am told, superintended the publication. I do not charge it upon the opposition as a party, for I take pleasure in saying, that however wrong I may think them in their politics, there are thousands of them who are high-minded, honorable men, who would suffer their right arms to be severed from their shoulders rather than descend to a mean or dishonorable action. But the men of any party, who would violate the secrecy of a confidential correspondence, who would procure the private communications passing between personal and political friends, and expose their contents to the world without the consent of the parties, are unworthy of the society of gentlemen any where, and deserve the scorn and indignation of every honest man in the community.

These letters were published to prove my inconsistency, in having once been favorable to Judge McLean, and being now for Mr. Van Buren; and the charge was made by individuals of the Harrison party, who acknowledged that General Harrison was not their first choice, but they supported him because he was taken up by their party! They preferred Mr. Clay or Mr. Webster; but when their friends settled down upon the hero of Tippecanoe, they went for him.

The friends of Judge McLean, who belonged to the democratic party, adhered to him as long as there was any prospect of his being run by that party. When that failed, and he withdrew from the canvass, to prevent the possibility of bringing the election of President into this House, then they, generally, went over to Mr. Van Buren.

[Here Mr. VINTON rose and requested leave to ask Mr. H. a question. Mr. H. "Certainly." Mr. V. "Will my colleague say whether he did not go over to Mr. Van Buren before Judge McLean declined?" Mr. H. "I will answer my colleague with pleasure. When first elected, my constituents knew I was a McLean man. Previous to my second election I published a card, stating that, whatever might be my individual preference, whenever my party united generally upon a candidate, I should go with them. With this information before them the people elected me, and I have faithfully kept my promise to the letter. That election was, I believe, before the Judge formally declined being a candidate. So much for my own individual affairs."]

Sir, the opposition may thank themselves, in some degree, for the election of Mr. Van Buren. They contributed very much to make him the candidate of the democratic party. Notwithstanding his eminent qualifications for the office, his claims might possibly have been postponed to a future election, had it not been for the rancorous persecution of his political enemies. The first step taken by them, to render him a favorite with the people, was the wanton rejection of his nomination as minister to England. This exhibited so much ill nature, so strong a desire to crush a supposed rival, and to gratify individual and partisan hatred at the hazard of sacrificing the public interest, that the friends of the administration rose up as one man, and, as an act of retributive justice, elevated the rejected minister to the presiding chair of that very Senate who had attempted to destroy him.

The next step taken by the opposition to make the Vice President popular with his own party was the daily abuse they bestowed upon him during the "panic session." They constantly connected "Jackson, Van Buren, and the party" together, to make up a triumvirate. This very naturally excited kind feelings towards him among those who were abused in common with the President and himself; in this manner they made him thousands of friends, and he was finally adopted as the candidate of the democratic party.

The gentleman tells us that the President nominated him as his successor, and that to this nomination he owes his election. I should be glad to know when, where, and under what circumstances, this nomination was made.

[Mr. PEXTON arose, and said he could tell the gentleman from Ohio, and would do so then, if he desired it; or would do it after he got through, whichever he pleased. Mr. HAMER remarked that it would be better, perhaps, for Mr. P. to give his sentiments after he had closed.]

I presume, sir, (said Mr. H.,) the gentleman from Tennessee refers to the Gwinn letter, written by the President in defence of some charge made against him in a Nashville paper. It is some time since I saw that letter, but such is the tenor of it, according to my recollection.

[Mr. PEXTON again arose, and made some remarks respecting this letter, contending that the article in the Nashville paper was not an attack upon General Jackson, but that it had been made a pretext for writing the letter, which denounced every body in advance who would not support Mr. Van Buren.]

Mr. H. proceeded. Let the nature of the article be what it might, one thing is certain—the letter was neither in form nor in substance a “nomination” of Mr. Van Buren. It advised union and harmony in the party, and spoke favorably of the proposed convention at Baltimore.

Suppose the President was favorable to him, was there any thing wrong in this? Does a Chief Magistrate lose the freedom of thought by his election to that office? This would be a new doctrine in our country.

It is not unnatural that he should be favorable to Mr. Van Buren. He knew him well. The latter had been associated with him for years in the administration of the Government. They agreed in opinion with respect to all the leading measures of the administration, and Mr. Van Buren was pledged, if elected, to carry them out, and pursue the policy of General Jackson. To such a candidate he could not well be opposed; but how did this influence the election? Where was the President's influence effectually exerted in favor of his successor? Not in Tennessee, for that State went against him. If there was any one State in the Union which could be influenced by him, it must be Tennessee; and yet that went for Judge White! Where, then, is the evidence of this “appointment of his successor,” so confidently charged upon all concerned? Nowhere but in the imagination of those who have asserted it so often that I dare say they begin to believe it themselves. Suppose the President had been for Judge White or for General Harrison, would there have been any complaints then? Not a word. They would have said: “Well, the President has got his eyes open at last to the true character of Mr. Van Buren; he can be deceived no longer; he has detected the imposition, and, with his characteristic independence, the noble old General has come out openly against him.” He would have been “glorified,” from one end of the continent to the other, by those who now abuse him.

The Baltimore convention nominated the Vice President, and made him the candidate of our party. This, too, is a grievous offence, and smacks of dictation too strongly to please the opposition. Pray, who first resorted to national conventions for such purposes? Who held the conventions at Baltimore that nominated Mr. Clay and Mr. Wirt, in the campaign of 1832? Who held the young men's national convention in this District, in the same year? We all know it was the whigs and the anti-masons. Yet these are the men who now abuse us in unmeasured terms for merely following their example.

But his locality greatly displeases some gentlemen, and they have abused New York in almost every debate that has occurred here for the last three years; and she is treated in the same manner in all their newspapers. And why may not New York have the honor of giving us a President? The South has given us four, New England has furnished two, and the West one; whilst New York and Pennsylvania, two great States, occupying a central position in the confederacy, each of them a nation within itself, have never furnished us one. What has New York done, that she is to be proscribed? Has she not signalized herself by a devotion to liberty, and an attachment to democratic principles, in all the great emergencies which the country has seen? Where was she in the revolutionary war? Battling among the foremost for independence. What was her position in the great political revolution that brought Mr. Jefferson into power? She stood side by side with her democratic sisters, struggling for the rights of the States against federal usurpation and monarchical principles. And in the war of 1812, where was she found? Sustaining the cause of the country as efficiently as any State in the Union, and holding at bay the Hartford convention party, who were not permitted to cross her territory into the Middle and Southern States. If this State has a distinguished son, worthy of the chief magistracy, why may he not be presented as a candidate for the suffrages of the people of the United States? So far from there being any thing wrong in it, there was a peculiar propriety, under all the circumstances, in taking the candidate from New York at the recent election.

Mr. Van Buren was thus made a candidate for the presidency of the United States. He encountered an opposition combining more talent with less scrupulousness in regard to the means employed to defeat him than was ever met before by any successful candidate for the same office. Their untiring exertions induced thousands of good men and sound patriots to vote against him, who were utterly misled with respect to his true character.

In some places he was denounced as a Catholic, for the purpose of inducing Protestants to vote against him. Many did so, in every State in the Union, believing that, if he succeeded, there would be a league formed between him and the Pope, and our religious liberties would be prostrated forever. Yet every intelligent man, of every party, knew this charge to be utterly false.

To the open, honest, straightforward voter he was denounced as a political intruder. We all know how easily this charge is made, how strongly inclined the people are to believe it when made against public men, and how difficult it is to disprove it in any case. During the late campaign, his friends have roundly denied the charge, and demanded the proof. What answer has been given? Why, that “he is so smooth and so sly in his operations that you cannot catch him at it!” Ah! and pray how was it ever discovered in the first instance, if he leaves no traces behind him?

At the South he was declared to be an abolitionist, and the people were persuaded that, if he succeeded, the constitutional guarantees for their domestic institutions, peculiar to that region, would be all broken down. In the North he was abused for being opposed to the abolitionists, an enemy to the freedom of speech and of the press, and in favor of slavery. Such was the hostility to him in that quarter, that nineteen out of every twenty, and perhaps ninety-nine out of every hundred, abolitionists in the United States voted against him. This was to be expected; for all who have taken the pains to ascertain his sentiments know that he is opposed to the doctrines and practices of the modern abolition party, in every shape and form.

In one place he was alleged to be in favor of giving all negroes the right of suffrage; and, in another region, he was censured for being an enemy to the poor, and against allowing them the privilege of voting for public officers. Both charges were without foundation in fact. By the same men he was declared to be a federalist, and an opposer of the war of 1812, when the history of that period proves him to have been a member of the Legislature of New York, and one of the most efficient friends of the war that then figured in public life.

In some places his talents were denied, although, but a few years back, the same men charged him with writing all General Jackson's messages, and frankly admitted that they were drawn up with great ability.

It would be a Herculean task to enumerate all the falsehoods propagated, and impositions practised, to accomplish his defeat. They all failed. Notwithstanding the people were appealed to in pathetic terms to come to the rescue, were assured that they would be ruined if they elected him, still they marched to the polls and gave him their votes. The people had been twice ruined by electing General Jackson; and, as they found it rather an agreeable operation, they concluded to try it a third time, and let Mr. Van Buren ruin them again.

He has been elected by the unbought suffrages of his fellow-citizens, and in a most remarkable manner. The vote received by him is diffused throughout the Union, so as to prove most clearly that nothing like a geographical division of parties exists in the country. All the efforts made towards that point have been unsuccessful. Including Michigan, he has received the votes of fifteen States out of twenty-six. He obtained the votes of a majority of the old thirteen States, and a majority of those of the new States. He has a majority of the electoral votes of the slaveholding and a majority of those of the non-slaveholding States of the Union. He has one hundred and seventy electoral votes, being a majority of forty-six over all his competitors put together; and he has a majority of all the individual votes of the people of the United States of from ten to twenty thousand. The exact number cannot be ascertained, because in South Carolina the people do not vote; the Legislature appoints the electors of President. Without this State, Mr. Van Buren has a majority of about twenty-two thousand, according to the calculation of the opposition newspapers themselves. But to make him out a "usurper," a "minority President," they count South Carolina as forty thousand--the whole number being set down against Mr. Van Buren, and none for him. Now, the Union party of that State compose from a third to one half of its population, and they are openly for him, and would have so given their votes, if permitted by the State Government to go to the polls, and vote directly for the President. If, then, the State can give forty thousand votes, fifteen thousand at least, and perhaps twenty thousand, would have been for Mr. Van Buren; for many nullifiers would have voted for him, I have no doubt, in preference to any other candidate before them. Allowing him but fifteen thousand, there would be a majority of ten thousand against him in the State. Deduct this from the twenty-two thousand majority he has in the other States, and he has still a clear majority of the individual votes of the Union of at least twelve thousand.

He is elected according to all the forms of the constitution, and by these large State electoral and individual majorities; and yet gentlemen call him a "usurper!" No; he is the constitutional, lawful President; and, from the 4th of March next, all men will be bound to obey him as such, within the pale assigned to him by the institutions of his country.

Suppose Mr. Van Buren had received one vote less than enough to elect him, and the question had come before this House. In that event, General Harrison, with seventy-three, or Judge White, with twenty-six votes, might have been elected. Such a result was by no means impossible. A distinguished gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. HARRIS] stated upon this floor, in a debate which occurred here last session, that the member who held the seat in the contested election from North Carolina might possibly give the casting vote for President, should the question come before us. In voting by States, no one can tell what the result would have been. If one of the gentlemen named had been successful, and we had risen and denounced him as a usurper, and declared war upon him in advance, because he was a minority President, what astonishment would have been expressed by the opposition! What lectures would have been delivered upon constitutional law and obligations! The motto would then have been, "judge him by his acts." But now, when our candidate is fairly elected by the independent voters of the Union, he is a usurper, because General Jackson was for him, or because the opposition do not like "the man!"

But if the war is to be commenced immediately, under whose banner do gentlemen propose to fight? Who is the candidate of the several parties opposed to the coming administration? Is it Judge Mangum, with the eleven votes of South Carolina to start upon? Who ever thought of him for President, until that State voted for him the other day? Is it Mr. Webster, with the fourteen votes of Massachusetts; or Judge White, with the twenty-six votes of Tennessee and Georgia? Why, sir, I mean no disrespect to either of these gentlemen, but really, with such a capital as either of them has, we should say, in the Western phrase, "it would be rather a dull chance!" Shall we have a distinguished gentleman from Kentucky, who was not a candidate in the late campaign? We have beaten him two or three times already, and we can do it again, whenever his friends choose to bring him forward. Shall we have the hero of Tippecanoe upon the track once more? The worthy gentleman who was at the head of the Clay electoral ticket of Ohio in 1824, and who, three years ago, in a public speech, declared that the surplus revenue ought to be applied to the purchase of slaves in the Southern States, for the purpose of colonization? He, of course, adopted the doctrines of the great "American system;" he is a politician of that school. He desires, too, that the taxes levied upon the South, over and above what are needed by the Government, shall be expended in buying up their slaves; or, in other words, he would tax them to obtain money to pay them for their own property! Will the South support that doctrine?

What are the opinions and sentiments of the candidate, whoever he may be, upon whom all the little parties can unite? Who are to be his supporters? They are the nullifiers, the anti-masons, the abolitionists, the black-cockade federalists, and their regular successors who hold the same principles; and the honest but misguided democrats, who are led away by the acts and professions of these various parties. What a crew would this be to put on board the old vessel of state? Suppose their President were now elected, how would it be possible for him to sustain himself? I take it for granted his cabinet would be made up of distinguished men, taken from the different fragments of his party; for, to be supported, he must consult the wishes of his friends in the selection of important officers, and in the recommendation of public measures. It has been said that a President elected by this House would have been brought to terms in regard to public policy. True, if you could have agreed among yourselves upon what the terms should be! But let that pass. Imagine you see the new President, at the "White House," preparing to send in his first annual message to Congress, with his cabinet around him. The message is carefully read through, and each member is desired to give his opinion freely with respect to it.

The first one who speaks is a thoroughgoing bankite, who believes the Government cannot manage its fiscal concerns without a "mammoth." He insists that there shall be a positive recommendation of a national bank, and refuses to give his approbation to the document because there is no such paragraph in it. This brings to his feet the Southern strict constructionist, who denies the authority of Congress to legislate on the subject, and who declares his utter abhorrence for any such proposition; declaring, furthermore, that it will break down the administration to avow this sentiment. The nullifier gives his opinion that there is a strong inclination, in two or three places, towards "centralism;" that these passages must be altered, and a few remarks added on the subject of "concurrent majorities." To this the federalist strenuously objects, and insists that the centrifugal force is much the more powerful in our republic, the great danger being that the parts will fly off from the common centre.

Next comes the anti-mason, who says the message is altogether defective. "You must give us a little fee-faw-fum in it." "Say something about the outrages committed upon the person of Captain William Morgan; and give them a touch about extra-judicial oaths, and secret societies, plotting the overthrow of our liberties." "That is all very well," says the abolitionist; "but I shall never give the message my sanction, unless it contains something in favor of 'human rights,' 'natural equality,' and 'the great danger of national judgments on account of our national sins!'"

What would the Executive Chief do in this state of perplexity? Would he gratify all? What a pretty piece of patchwork! What a dignified, elevated, and able state paper his message would be! Would he reject a part of the propositions and adopt the remainder? Which individuals would he follow? Who would be the favorites? No man on earth can tell any thing about it. The people saw this; they perceived that to follow the opposition was like taking a leap in the dark—whilst, in voting for Mr. Van Buren, they were walking in the light of open day. They knew his principles, and could foresee the policy of his administration; and they very wisely preferred him over all his political competitors.

Against whom is this war to be waged with such fury? It is against the democratic party, with Martin Van Buren at its head. Gentlemen may sneer at this if they choose; but it is so. Men may call themselves what they please, but there is one infallible mode, and one only, of deciding to what party an individual belongs. A federalist may call himself a democrat, and a democrat may claim to be a federalist; but ask for his principles, for his political creed, and then you can soon determine to what party he is really attached. Try us by this rule, and it will be found that we are the democratic party, "par excellence," if gentlemen choose to apply the term.

In this country, Thomas Jefferson is now universally acknowledged to have been the great "apostle of democracy." Whatever party of this day comes nearest to his principles is the democratic party, let others call themselves what they may. What were his principles? He was against the Bank of the United States. So are we. He was opposed to a high tariff; collecting from the people large sums of money annually, which are not wanted for any of the legitimate purposes of the Government. So are we. He was against the construction of works of internal improvement, under the authority of the General Government, checkering the whole country with roads and canals, made by the funds drawn from the industry of the nation. So are the friends of the present administration. He believed that Senators and Representatives were bound to obey the instructions of their constituents, or to resign their places and allow others to take them who would. So do we. Look to the evidences exhibited within the last few years of the truth of this position; whilst the opposition have generally disregarded instructions, and boldly retained their offices, in defiance of the public will.

Upon all the cardinal points and doctrines of the old democratic party of 1800, we of the present dominant party are agreed. There is a unity of sentiment among us in regard to these principles, which proves conclusively that we are the democracy of the country. The opposition have no common creed; but, so far as general principles are concerned, we find them constantly making war upon these doctrines in practice.

The means employed in this war will be similar to those always employed against the democratic party, and such as have signalized the opposition for some years past. They arrogate to themselves "all the talents" of the country, particularly in both Houses of Congress; and their puffers and letter-writers aid them to make that impression upon the public mind. Every prominent man upon our side is denounced as greatly deficient either in talents or in political honesty; he is either knave or fool. "Demagogue" is the common appellation applied to all who advocate popular rights and popular doctrines.

"All the religion and morality" are claimed to be on the side of the opposition; and it is evidenced by that portion of them who weep and wail over "poor Indians" and "poor negroes!" The "decency," too, all belongs to them. Witness the poetry upon "Dusky Sally," published against Mr. Jefferson; the coffin handbills circulated against General Jackson, and the violent and abusive harangues and publications against almost all the prominent men of our party.

The newspapers on our side are universally denounced as unworthy of confidence, whilst their own, even the most abandoned and profligate, are held up as prodigies of truth and patriotism. And last, though not least, they resort to various schemes for buying up the people with their own money! No plan will be left untried upon this subject. A distribution of land or of its proceeds, a deposit or distribution law to be passed annually, or any other plan which will effect the object, will be resorted to. This policy leads the people, when the election is approaching, to inquire, "which candidate is in favor of giving us money," or "who will get the most money for us?" In this contest about money, principle will be overlooked; and we shall be governed by the most low, grovelling, and mercenary motives which ever control the human mind.

The North and the South, the East and the West, have been invoked to join in this crusade against the new administration. The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. PICKENS] called upon the South to come to the rescue, and confidently predicted that Massachusetts, and the country on both sides of the Ohio, would aid in the prostration of Mr. Van Buren. Sir, the gentleman will find himself in a like condition with a celebrated character in English history, who could "call spirits from the vasty deep;" but, unfortunately, they would not come when he called them. The people of these United States are a just people, and they are disposed to bestow upon every man the reward which his conduct has merited. They will not condemn a public officer until he has done something worthy of condemnation. I know that politicians sometimes act otherwise. That "ill-weaved ambition," which prompts men to rash and dangerous experiments, may induce a public man to condemn without a hearing; but private citizens will hear before they strike.

As many gentlemen have recently ventured to prophecy in regard to future events, I will follow the example. I hope, however, to be more successful than the opposition have been for the last eight or ten years. My prediction is, that the next administration will pursue a calm, prudent, and wise policy, both at home and abroad; that it will bear about the same relation to General Jackson's that Mr. Madison's did to Mr. Jefferson's administration, with the exception that there will be no national bank chartered. And if Mr. Van Buren should be a candidate for re-election, he will get all the States he did at the late election, and the votes of Georgia, Ohio, Indiana, and I believe Tennessee, in addition. The country will proceed in its career of prosperity; and the close of his administration will see him one of the most popular Presidents that has ever occupied the executive chair of this great republic.

With regard to the resolution now before the House I have but little to say. I am in favor of a thorough examination of any department where there is reason to believe that either fraud, corruption, or dishonesty exists. Let there be some evidence to warrant the House in adopting the resolution; some definite charge, some distinct statement, to warrant the procedure, and I will go as far as any gentleman to ferret out the fraud, and drag the culprits to light. But I do not like the language of the original resolution. It is too general, too sweeping in its phraseology. It includes all the transactions of all men with the departments, whether direct or indirect, official or unofficial. The contracts and dealings of every private citizen, who has ever had anything to do with any department of the Government, may be thus subjected to the inspection of a committee of this House. It is to that I object.

Still, sir, I do not know but I shall vote for it as it is if I cannot get it altered. I have not heretofore voted for such propositions; but, after all that has been said by the opposition, I think it is due to the President, to ourselves, and to the coming administration, that we should throw open the doors, and let these gentlemen examine for the corruption about which so much has been said. It is due to the President, whose term of service is drawing to a close, that the condition of the departments be made known to the country; and, if fraud be found there, that the innocent should be justified and the guilty punished. It is due to ourselves, because we have been indirectly charged with a desire to smother and conceal the maladministration of public affairs. And it is due to the President elect that we should deliver the executive departments into his hands thoroughly purified from all iniquity, so as to make him responsible only for the misdeeds of his own subordinates, committed whilst he is in power. For these reasons I shall vote for a strict and general scrutiny, such as shall be satisfactory to all reasonable men, of every political party.

One word, Mr. Speaker, in conclusion, with respect to this kind of discussion in which we are now engaged. No one dislikes it more than I do. What I have said has been absolutely provoked by the course which gentlemen on the other side of the House have pursued. I have listened to their attacks upon the administration and upon its friends for a long time, in hopes that some one of more age and experience, and of greater ability, would meet these assaults, and repel them as they deserved. No one did so, and I considered it my duty to assume the position I have taken. I am aware that I have subjected myself to violent attacks, here and elsewhere. I surveyed the whole ground before I commenced, and having come to the conclusion that it was my duty to take the field, I am not the man to be deterred by consequences.

I have endeavored throughout the discussion to confine myself within the rules prescribed by parliamentary law. I have avoided all personalities, striking at masses of men, their movements and principles. These I consider fair game. If I have done injustice to any individual, I shall be ready to make such explanations as the circumstances may require; but to what I have said of parties, their conduct and principles, I shall firmly adhere, until convinced that I have been mistaken.

FRIDAY, JANUARY 6.

REPRINTING DOCUMENTS.

Mr. GILLET, from the Committee on Commerce, offered a resolution for the reprinting of sundry documents in relation to the reorganization of the Treasury Department, and the number and compensation of custom-house officers, &c., and for the printing of certain manuscript documents thereto appended.

Mr. ADAMS said he did not know that he had any great objection to reprinting these documents, but he would like to hear some reason given by a member of the Committee on Commerce why they should be reprinted. He would like to know whether the documents were large or small, what the expense would be, and whether any good was to result from reprinting them. The document was not intended for circulation among the people, but merely for the use of the members of the House. He believed it was not customary to reprint documents which had been already published, for the use of the members.

Mr. GILLET explained that the documents were of inconsiderable size, and that his object was to collect together the information requisite to the understanding of the particular subjects to which the documents had reference, with a view to place that information collectedly in the possession of members.

As to the expense, he had not examined the question. He felt no personal solicitude about the reprinting; and his sole object had been to lay before the members, in a compact form, the information which was requisite to their action on the subjects embraced.

Mr. E. WHITTLESEY called for a division of the question; that was to say, on the printing of so much of the documents as now remained in manuscript; so far he had no objection; but the other portion of the documents had been twice printed already, and the question presented was to reprint all the business documents on the calendar, which had not been acted on at the last session of Congress—whether documents were to be printed a third time. This was economy with a vengeance! It was a species of reform to which he hoped the attention of every member would be turned.

He cared nothing for any amount of necessary expenditure in printing; that he was at all times willing to vote for. The charge which had been made by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. GILLET,] against the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. DAVIS,] could not be made against him, (Mr. W.) because he had raised his voice against these expenses, and the House had not sustained him. However voluminous the documents might be, if it was actually necessary he would go to the full extent, whatever the expense might be.

Mr. GILLET explained that these documents were not to be reprinted for the purpose of being bound up, but merely to put the House in possession of information which it was indispensable they should have before acting on the bills to which the documents related. He reminded the member from Ohio of the vote which he [Mr. WHITTLESEY] had given at a former session, in favor of printing a very useless document, which served the purpose only of wrapping paper for merchants, &c.; he alluded to the Post Office report.

Mr. E. WHITTLESEY said he had nothing to do with the number of the Post Office document which the House had ordered. But he did not raise his voice against the printing of that document, because he thought then, and he still continued to think, that that document should be disseminated through every nook and corner of the United States; and he pledged himself that if the gentleman from New York would now bring forward a document equally important, he (Mr. W.) would not stop at any number short of twenty thousand. That document had developed one of the most stupendous frauds that had ever been brought to light under any Government on earth; and the reports of the majority and minority of that committee were so essentially alike, that the best friends of the administration in this House could no longer sustain the Post Office Department.

Had the gentleman from New York ever read that report? Mr. W. apprehended he had not, or he [Mr. GILLET] never would have risen and pronounced the document useless. Was it not shown by that report that the Department was insolvent? And had not its debts to be paid out of the public Treasury? What was the fact now? Notwithstanding the Department at that time was in debt some seven or eight hundred thousand dollars, there was now a surplus on hand of some two or three hundred thousand dollars. This great and advantageous change had been brought about under the present administration of the Department; but it had been achieved under the auspices of the Post Office Committee, without whose untiring exertions and fidelity in that investigation the Department would have been in a state of the most deplorable bankruptcy. And yet such a document was useless.

AFTER a few explanatory observations from Mr. CONNOR and Mr. GILLET,

Mr. SUTHERLAND said he thought this was a matter which did not require much speaking, and that the question had better be decided one way or the other. The only question was, did the House want the information or not? If they thought it was worth printing, let them have it; if not, let it pass. The Committee on Commerce did not want it; the gentleman from New York [Mr. GILLET] did not want it. But he (Mr. S.) would say, let us have it, if the unenlightened gentlemen of the House did want it.

Mr. D. J. PEARCE spoke in favor of the motion to print, and said that the rejection of it would not be extending towards the Committee on Commerce the courtesy usually manifested in such cases.

AFTER some further remarks from Mr. ADAMS,

Mr. GIDEON LEE said that, upon the calculation that every five hours of the time of the House was worth $3,000, a portion of time had been expended in the debate which would pay the expense of printing these documents many times over. He was under the necessity, therefore, of invoking the aid of that labor-saving machine, the previous question.

And the House seconded the call.

And the main question was ordered to be now put.

And the main question, in part, being on the reprinting of documents other than those in manuscript, was taken, and lost.

And the second portion of the main question, being on the printing of the manuscript document, was taken, and decided in the affirmative. So the manuscript document alone was ordered to be printed.

R. P. LETCHER AND T. P. MOORE.

The bill for the relief of Robert P. Letcher and Thomas P. Moore coming up, on its final passage—

Mr. LANE called for the yeas and nays on that question.

Mr. UNDERWOOD moved the recommitment of the bill to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

AFTER a few words from Messrs. HUNTSMAN and LANE,

Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, called for the yeas and nays on the question of recommitment.

After a few remarks from Mr. MANN, of New York, Mr. ANTHONY called for the previous question.

Mr. RENCHER moved to lay the bill on the table, and called for the yeas and nays; which were ordered; and, being taken, were: Yeas 35, nays 157.

So the motion to lay the bill on the table was lost.

The question then recurring on seconding the previous question, the House seconded the same: Yeas 83, nays 46.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, called for the yeas and nays on the question of taking the main question; but the House refused to order them.

And the main question was ordered to be now put.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, called for the yeas and nays on the main question; which were ordered.

And the main question, "shall the bill pass?" was then taken, and decided in the affirmative: Yeas 125, nays 64, as follows:

So the bill was passed.

WILLIAM ANDERSON.

The bill for the relief of the legal representatives of William Anderson coming up—

AFTER some remarks by Messrs. UNDERWOOD, VINTON, PARKER, BELL, HUNTSMAN, BRIGGS, and CAVE JOHNSON,

Mr. SHIELDS said that, at the commencement of this discussion, he had been improperly impressed with the belief that the Cherokee Indians and the United States were in a state of partial war at the time the loss was sustained for which these claimants are now seeking indemnity; but, upon a careful examination of the history of the times, and the circumstances immediately connected with this claim, (said he,) I find that, at that period, a state of perfect peace existed between that tribe of Indians and this country. It will not, therefore, be necessary to consider, in the argument which I now propose to submit, whether this Government should or should not indemnify her citizens for depredations committed upon their property by the enemies of the country, when in a state of actual war with another Power. The Committee on Indian Affairs, by which this bill was reported, state, in its accompanying report, that this claim rests upon the same facts and circumstances, or, rather, that it is identical in point of proof, with the claim of the heirs of James Brown, which was allowed at a former session of Congress. I shall, therefore, in this discussion, refer to the facts in that case, as reported by the Committee on Indian Affairs in 1832, and shall take the facts as reported by that committee, at least, as prima facie true. These claimants allege that they should be indemnified as the legal representatives of William Anderson, deceased, for the loss of property plundered from their ancestor, James Brown, by the Cherokee Indians, in 1788. It will be recollected by every one that, by the terms of the treaty of Hopewell, concluded in 1785, that portion of territory which now composes a considerable part of Middle Tennessee was ceded to this country by the Cherokees, and was immediately thrown open for the reception and occupation of our citizens. Among the early adventurers who manifested a disposition to establish a permanent home in this part of the Western wilderness was James Brown, the ancestor of these claimants. In the fall of 1787, he and his family, carrying with them all their valuable property, arrived on the banks of the Holston; more than two hundred miles distant, by land, from the place of their destination. Believing that a passage down the Tennessee river could be more easily effected, and be, at the same time, less perilous, than a trip across the mountains, early in the following May (1788) they embarked, with a considerable amount of property, on board a boat, which they had prepared in the mean time, and descended the Tennessee river. While floating down this river, after they had reached the limits of the Indian territory, through which they had necessarily to pass, by an act of the basest perfidy, under the disguise of friendship, they were suddenly surrounded by upwards of seventy Cherokee warriors. Mr. Brown himself, two of his sons, and five boatmen, "the only adult males on board the boat," were instantly slain, Mrs. Brown, her three daughters, and two minor sons, made captives, and their property plundered and carried off by the Indians. It is for the loss of a small portion of this property, thus violently seized, that one of these captive girls who afterwards became Mrs. Anderson, and her orphan children, now ask an indemnity from the Government. Can the Government, consistently with its past policy, its future interest, and the justice of this individual application, allow the sought-for indemnity? It is, in the first place, I believe, admitted that, in time of peace, there is a claim on our Government for the protection of the person and property of the citizen, and for spoiliations committed by any other than our own citizens. But it is contended, in argument, that we have not sufficiently shown that a state of peace then existed, and that the very act of hostility of which we complain is evidence of the want of a state of actual peace; and that a state of peace or war with an Indian tribe can only be determined by the character of the acts of one or both of the parties! I infer, however, that a state of peace existed at that period, from the history of the times, the cotemporary conduct of a large community of our citizens who resided in the vicinity of this tribe of Indians, the conduct of James Brown himself, and from direct and unequivocal declarations of the Congress of the United States, contained in a proclamation of that year on this very subject.

Prior to his departure from the settlement on the Holston, the ancestor of the petitioners obtained a permit from one of the headmen of the tribe to pass on his contemplated voyage through the Indian territory, accompanied with every assurance of protection and safety. The community in which he had resided from the fall of 1787 until May, 1788, were on terms of perfect amity, and indeed had been from the treaty of Hopewell up to that time. And, further, this treaty of Hopewell, it should not be forgotten, contained the following remarkable provisions, with regard to our relations towards the Cherokees, in articles 9 and 10, to wit: That "the United States in Congress assembled shall have the exclusive right of regulating the trade with the Indians, and managing all their affairs, in such manner as they think proper;" and, again: "Until the pleasure of Congress be made known respecting the 9th article, all traders, citizens of the United States, shall have liberty to go to any of the tribes or towns of the Cherokees, to trade with them; and they shall be protected in their persons and property, and kindly treated."

No other intercourse regulations had been entered into with this tribe previous to 1788, and none, except one or two of a very partial bearing, up to the general intercourse law of 1802, which has regulated our intercourse with all the Indian tribes from that to the present time. It is true there were other stipulations in the several treaties concluded, respectively, at Holston in 1791, at Philadelphia in 1792 and 1794, and at Tellico in October, 1798, but none of a general nature touching this point. There is still stronger evidence of our peaceable relations to be found in the proclamation of Congress to which I have already alluded. This proclamation was issued, by a resolution of Congress, the 2d day of September, 1788, in four or five months after the plunder of the boat and murder of Brown and the crew. This proclamation, a copy of which I now hold in my hand, recognises and reaffirms the obligations and binding efficacy of the treaty of Hopewell, without the slightest complaint with regard to any breach of the treaty, or of any depredations on the part of the Indians; in which, also, they threaten heavy penalties against any of the citizens of the United States who should dare to infringe any of the articles of that treaty. It is evident, from the language of this proclamation, that Congress regarded the Cherokees in a state of amity at that time; and, from what we have stated already, it is equally evident that our citizens who resided on the borders of that tribe so regarded our relations at the same period. These considerations seem to me to exclude the idea of the existence of a state of war at the date of the loss sustained by the petitioners. The several reports of the Committee on Indian Affairs on this subject, in summing up the testimony on this point, fully concur in the same opinion. "This is an application," says the able chairman of this committee, "to be paid the value of property taken with force by the Cherokee Indians prior to the enactment of laws regulating trade and intercourse with the Indian tribes, and in time of peace between the Cherokees and the United States." Then the act of which we complain has not been regarded by the committee, and I think cannot be looked upon as creating a state of partial war, or, as some of the gentlemen have styled it, a state of quasi war, so as to exclude this claim from a favorable consideration by Congress, under the established policy of the Government.

If this position were correct, you cannot conceive of any possible case in which those who had sustained an injury in time of peace by Indian treachery and violence could obtain redress for the loss and outrage; for the obvious answer would be ever ready, that the Government does not indemnify her citizens against the depredations of an enemy committed in time of war. The act of hostility complained of creates a state of Indian war, because Indians never make formal declarations of war, like civilized nations; therefore the indemnity in this particular case cannot be allowed. This position cannot be sustained in any point of view. Nor is it conceived that the risk and hazard which Brown encountered by descending the river through the Cherokee country is such a departure from a course of due propriety, and from the obvious sense of the existing treaty regulations, as to exclude these claimants from relief. His object—the settlement of the newly acquired territory—was lawful, and even commendable. He had obtained a permit from the nation to pass through their grounds, and the proof is, that his conduct towards the Indians was unexceptionable in all things. This is altogether unlike the case of a trader, whose object is to gain by traffic. He surely, then, had not, by his own conduct, put his person and property without the pale of the protection of his Government. It will be seen, by inspecting the several treaties with the Cherokees, that no provisions were made in any of them to satisfy such claims as the present. But in the 9th article of the treaty of Tellico, or, as it is more familiarly called, the treaty of 1798, the usual remedy between the Indians and border settlers, which is that of reprisal, was expressly taken away, leaving the party injured without any summary redress, and, indeed, without any redress at all, unless this Government shall interpose its protection. It is provided in the article of the treaty of 1798 just quoted, that “all animosities, aggressions, thefts, and plunderings,” prior to the date of the first conferences in that year, “shall cease, and be no longer remembered or demanded on either side.”—(Laws of the United States, vol. 1, p. 334.) By this treaty stipulation, even the privilege to demand their rights of the Cherokees was expressly taken away from our citizens. And, much more, the ordinary remedy, so much practised on the Western frontier, of reprisal. It does seem to me most clear that the Government, by this act, became liable, in good faith, to satisfy all bona fide claims of private citizens against the Cherokees that existed prior to the treaty of 1798, on account of “aggressions, thefts, and plunderings, of that nation.”

But it is argued, that if this claim should be allowed, a new policy will be established and introduced into our legislation, which will prove in the end onerous to the Government. This position is so far from being correct, that, if this claim be rejected, it will change the whole policy of this Government with regard to such claims, for the last ten or fifteen years. I do not pretend, said Mr. S., to have that profound information as to our Indian relations, or as to precedent generally, as many honorable gentlemen who have addressed the House on this subject. I have neither had the experience nor the means necessary to such attainments. But, in examining the past course of the Government on this subject, I find the aggregate sum of twenty-one thousand and eighty-six dollars appropriated, by act of Congress “approved 25th March, 1830,” as full compensation to certain individuals named in said act, for horses stolen and property destroyed and taken by the Osage Indians, in the years 1816, 1817, 1823.—(Vol. 8, Laws of U. S. 294.) And again, in the year 1832, I find the sum of nine thousand seven hundred and fifty dollars appropriated by act of Congress of that year, to be paid to the legal representatives of John and James Pettigrew, for depredations committed on the private property of the Pettigrews, while navigating the Tennessee river in 1794, with interest upon that sum at the rate of six per centum per annum, from the date of the loss sustained, until the same should be paid—[Here Mr. SHIELDS asked the favor of the Clerk to read the report of the committee in the case of the Pettigrews, which he did]—and which Mr. S. said was similar, in all its material circumstances, to the claim now under consideration. The loss was sustained by private individuals, while descending the Tennessee river, in the Cherokee territory, by the act of that tribe of Indians, while in a state of peace. Mr. S. said, I might cite many other cases in point, from Missouri and elsewhere, which I have before me, but I will not consume the time of the House by reciting them. I shall desist, after again directing the attention of honorable members to the case of the heirs of James Brown, of which this claim is a counterpart, a duplicate, which in fact is identical with it in all its circumstances. [He here sent the report of the committee in Brown's case to the Clerk, a part of which was then read.] I am satisfied, after this explanation, that it must be apparent to all, that whatever may be done hereafter, Congress has repeatedly heretofore granted relief in many cases precisely similar to the one made out in this application; and, indeed, that it has been the policy of the Government, for a number of years past, without exception, up to this time, to do so. I cannot, therefore, see why this claim of the widow and orphans of William Anderson should be made an exception to a rule so well established. But I am apprehensive that the prospective claims from Florida may have an undue weight upon the minds of some, in deciding upon this claim. Still I hope they will not; it will be time enough to consider the justice of those claims when they shall have been presented. If, however, the policy of the Government, heretofore pursued with regard to the Cherokee depredations committed prior to the treaty of 1798, should appear to be obviously unjust, I grant it should be abandoned. But I cannot see how any one can come to this conclusion, so as to make this small claim, which is perhaps the last of that class, an exception to a rule which has so long prevailed.

Mr. EVERETT, in reply to the arguments in favor of the bill, [of Mr. BELL, Mr. ASHLEY, and Mr. SHIELDS,] said that, since the debate of yesterday, he had examined this case, and was satisfied there was no foundation in principle for the claim. He was aware of the difficulty of engaging the attention of the House to an argument dry and uninteresting in itself, more especially in opposition to a claim of so trifling an amount. In addition to this, he was asking the House to reverse its own decision in a case identical with this, (the bill for the relief of Joseph Brown, passed in 1834.) It was reported in 1832, and sanctioned by a second report in 1834. The report in the present case, made at the last session, refers to that case, and relies on it as a precedent. He did not recollect whether the case of Brown underwent a discussion. It was reported and passed while he was engaged elsewhere on another committee, and was now for the first time brought to his notice; and the importance of the principles assumed was his apology for addressing the House, and constituted his only claim to their attention.

If the aggression complained of was an act of war, the principle assumed would extend to all aggressions of the enemy in time of war. This principle has not been adopted by any Government. The decisions of Congress have been uniform, on claims for such aggressions during the revolutionary and late wars. If a distinction is taken in favor of Indian aggressions, the principle will extend to those of the West down to the treaty of Greenville (1795,) to those of the Black Hawk war, and to those committed and committing by the Creeks and Seminoles. At the time of this aggression (1788) there was but little ground for a distinction between Indian and foreign wars. The Indians were then regarded as foreign and independent nations; they were not surrounded by our settlements nor under our control. He would refer the House to the report of the Committee on Indian Affairs, in 1834, on the case of Alfred Stewart.* If the aggression was to be taken as committed in time of peace, the principle assumed would extend to aggressions in all time before recognised war. It would be an authority for the allowance of the claims for the French spoiliations prior to 1800.

Mr. E. said he should meet the claim on its strongest ground; that, for the purpose of the argument, he would give the claim the benefit of the admission of a fact left doubtful in the report—that the aggression was committed in time of peace, and was not in itself an act of war. I will here remark (continued Mr. E.) that the claim is for an aggression committed not on the person but on the property of the claimant, and that the claim derives no aid from the hostile character of the aggression.

The case, then, is simply this: The claimant, in 1788, with the assent of the Cherokee nation, was passing down the Tennessee river, within the Cherokee country, with his property, not for the purpose of trade, but with the sole view of passing through their country, to make a settlement below it, when his property was forcibly taken from him by the Cherokees; and for the property so taken he claims compensation. On what principle? Upon the assumed principle that the Government were bound to protect its citizens against Indian depredations, committed even in the Cherokee country; that it is bound to seek redress for such depredations; that it having made a treaty without securing such redress, or having by treaty released the claim, they are bound to indemnify the sufferers. To lay a foundation even for the assumption of these principles, it should appear that some right, secured to the claimant by treaty, had been violated, and that the Government had in fact released a subsisting claim for indemnity. I shall endeavor to show that the aggression was not in violation of any right secured to the claimant by treaty; that no subsisting claim has been released; and that the Government are not bound, by any adopted principle of right or policy, to indemnify the claimant.

The treaty of Hopewell, of 1785, was the first treaty with the Cherokees, and established our first relation of peace with that tribe. By the 9th article of this treaty we secured the right to regulate the Indian trade; and the 10th article provides that, "until the pleasure of Congress be known respecting the 9th article, all traders, citizens of the United States, shall have liberty to go to any of the tribes or towns of the Cherokees, to trade with them, and shall be protected in their persons and property, and kindly treated." The 5th article provides that if any citizen of the United States, or other person, not being an Indian, shall attempt to settle on * Extract from the report in the case of Alfred Stewart:

"That the petitioner, as heir, claims compensation for five negroes, taken in 1780, in a hostile manner, by an armed band of Cherokee Indians, within their territory, from his father, Thomas Stewart, a citizen of North Carolina, while removing with his family to Tennessee.

"The committee find the facts stated to be true. They are, however, of opinion that the petitioner is not entitled to relief. The injury complained of was, in itself, an act of war, committed while the United States were at war with the Cherokees, and to which the party voluntarily subjected himself by entering the territory of a hostile nation. Though the acts of war may have been occasional only, yet, until relations of peace were established by the Government, the hazard must rest on those who undertake it; so much so that no obligation is imposed on the Government even to demand redress, much less to indemnify the sufferers."

their hunting grounds, &c., such person shall forfeit the protection of the United States. No rights were secured to citizens to go into the Cherokee country for any purpose except that of trading with the Cherokees; protection was secured by the treaty to the property of traders only. The right of navigating the Tennessee river was not secured by this treaty, as was supposed by the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. BELL,] but by the treaty of 1791. The claimant was not a trader; he was not passing through the Cherokee country for that purpose. At that day the Indian tribes were treated with as foreign nations; and it is somewhat singular that in this treaty there is a provision relating to retaliation or reprisals, in case of a violation of the treaty: "that retaliation shall not be practised on either side, except where there is a manifest violation of this treaty, and then it shall be preceded first by a demand of justice; and, if refused, then by a declaration of hostilities."

Persons going into the Cherokee country had no other security than the treaty. In every other respect they submitted themselves to such usage as might befall them, without having any claim to call on the Government to seek redress for any injury either to their persons or property. The Cherokees may have violated their faith pledged to Anderson, but not the treaty. It is not intended to say that for any outrage the Government might not, if it chose, demand satisfaction; but that an individual has no right to demand this of Government, except for the violation of a right secured by treaty. It may here be proper to refer to the case of Pettigrew and Scott.—(Report of March 22, 1832.) The report in that case is based on two facts, which are wanting in this case: that the aggression was committed in 1794, when descending the Tennessee river, in violation of a right secured by the treaty of 1791; and that the treaty of 1793 ceded lands in satisfaction of that aggression. They appear to have inferred the last fact rather from evidence of what occurred pending the treaty than from the treaty itself.

It will be remembered that the aggression was in 1788. The next material fact is that war immediately succeeded, and continued until 1791. Whatever claims the Government might have had against the Cherokees, even for violations of the treaty, were merged in the war. It is the remedy sought by the parties for the redress of all injuries. Admit, then, for the sake of the argument, that a right of the claimant, secured by treaty, had been violated, and that the Government were bound to seek redress, the act of war was the measure by which redress was sought—the highest act to which a nation can resort. And whether they in fact obtain redress must depend on the fate of war. But no Government guarantees the result. Its duty is, by all reasonable means consistent with the best interest of the community, to seek redress. It is not, however, bound to continue a war until redress is obtained. The higher interest of the country must control; and if this requires that a peace should be made without obtaining redress, the loss must be submitted to. The Government is bound only to use its best efforts; these failing, the citizen must submit to the fate of war. If, however, a satisfaction be obtained, in part or in whole, the Government is bound to distribute it among the claimants. The claimants for the French spoiliations prior to 1800 base their claims on the allegation that their rights secured by treaty were violated; and that the Government, by treaty, have released those claims, in consideration of an equivalent. The issue is made on the equivalent; but if the principle now assumed be admitted, this issue becomes immaterial. They will be entitled to relief, though an equivalent was not obtained, because it was not obtained.

By the treaty of Holston, of 1791, an end was put to the war, without any stipulation for satisfaction for prior aggressions on property. It provides for the mutual restoration of prisoners only. This applied to no species of property. The treaty of 1785 provided not only for the restoration of prisoners, but contained the further provision: "They shall also restore all the negroes and other property taken during the late war." The treaty of 1791 was simply a treaty of peace, not of indemnity. "There shall be perpetual peace and friendship between," &c. "All animosities for past grievances shall henceforth cease." The effect of the act of peace itself was to bury all past animosities. It foreclosed all claim on the part of the Government or its citizens for past injuries; all right ceased, and no subsequent treaty could affect them, unless they were expressly recognised or assumed.

H. OF R.]

William Anderson.

It is assumed in the report that the treaty of 1798 released these claims. The last clause in the 9th article is, that "all animosities, aggressions, thefts, and plunderings, prior to that day, shall cease, and be no longer remembered or demanded on either side." The assumption supposes that, notwithstanding the intervention of the war and the treaty of 1791, the plunderings of 1788 were existing claims. Independent, however, of this, the treaty of 1798 has no relation to these claims, but to claims subsequent to 1791. Difficulties arose as to the execution of the treaty of 1791, which gave occasion to the treaties of 1794 and 1798. Neither of these were treaties of peace, but treaties to modify and carry into effect the treaty of peace. The treaty of Philadelphia of 1794 (which I shall have occasion to mention for another purpose hereafter) increased the Cherokee annuity from $1,000 to $5,000, and provided "that for every horse which shall be stolen from the white inhabitants by any Cherokee Indians, and not returned within three months, the sum of fifty dollars shall be deducted from the said annuities of five thousand dollars." The particular object of the 9th article of the treaty of Tellico of 1798 was to release all claims for horses stolen prior to the commencement of the negotiations in that year, and, generally, all other claims then existing, prior to that date; that claim which had been extinguished by a prior war and treaty. The article is as follows:

"ART. 9. It is mutually agreed between the parties, that horses stolen, and not returned within ninety days, shall be paid for at the rate of sixty dollars each; if stolen by a white man, citizen of the United States, the Indian proprietor shall be paid in cash; and if stolen by an Indian, from a citizen, to be deducted as expressed in the fourth article of the treaty of Philadelphia. This article shall have retrospect to the commencement of the first conferences at this place in the present year, and no further; and all animosities, aggressions, thefts, and plunderings, prior to that day, shall cease, and be no longer remembered or demanded on either side."

I have thus endeavored to show that no right secured to the claimant by treaty had been violated; that the Government was not bound to demand satisfaction for the alleged aggression; that all rights between the Government and its citizens and the Cherokees were merged in the war; that the treaty of peace of 1791 put an end to all claims for prior aggressions, and to all claims of our citizens on the Government to seek satisfaction; and that the treaty of 1798 had no possible relation or effect on the claim before us. I might here consider the claim as disposed of. But it is due to the report, and to the gentlemen who have advocated this claim, that I should notice the argument that is founded on what is said to be the policy of the Government, to make compensation for Indian depredations. It is alleged that this is the established policy of the Government, to prevent retaliation and to preserve peace. It has been almost asserted that individuals have a right to seek redress by retaliation or reprisal. No Government, however, has recognised this right. No Government can submit its peace to the hazards of such a principle.

The policy of a Government is prospective, not retrospective. A policy that may be proper in 1834 does not require its application to facts that took place in 1788. At that time no such policy was thought of. The Indian tribes were then recognised only as independent nations. They were not then surrounded by the whites; we had no hold on them for payment for depredations; they had little or no personal property. It was only when we had granted annuities, and had the power of retaining compensation, that we adopted the policy, not of paying for Indian depredations, but of making the Indians pay for them; thus binding the tribe as a surety for the acts of individuals. The first suggestion of this principle is found in the treaty of Philadelphia. This was the first treaty that secured any considerable annuity to an Indian tribe, and contains the first provision for a deduction from it for compensation for Indian depredations, applicable, however, to the single article only of horses stolen. The first intercourse act was passed in 1790, the second in 1793; neither contained any provision on this subject; but the act that followed next after the treaty of 1794, viz: in 1796, adopted the preamble of that article, and extended it to all Indian depredations; and the same article has been since continued in force. The construction of these acts did not secure an eventual indemnification; it was limited to cases of depredations committed within our own limits, by Indian tribes with which we were at peace, and to which annuities were payable. And it was not until 1834 that the United States adopted the principle of paying for such depredations, whether annuities were payable or not. We are now called upon to apply this late-adopted principle to a transaction of 1788. It gives me no pleasure to resist this claim. The hour that I have detained the House is of more value than the amount. We have already paid some thousands of dollars on the principal claim, of which this is a mere remnant. But, sir, when we look to the magnitude of the claims which must follow the allowance of this, we cannot too soon, even at the hazard of inconsistency, retrace our steps by rejecting the bill.

Mr. CRAIG moved to postpone the bill until Friday next. Lost.

Some further debate took place, between Messrs. CRAIG, HOAR, WARDWELL, BELL, WILLIAMS of North Carolina, ASHLEY, WHITTLESEY of Ohio, THOMPSON of South Carolina, SHIELDS, and HARPER.

Mr. WHITE, of Florida, said it was not his habit to address the House on any subject that was not directly connected with the interests of his immediate constituents, and he should not consider it proper upon any occasion to go out of his way for the purpose of saying any thing upon a private claim, with the merits of which he was not at all acquainted. The honorable member from Tennessee (said he) has shown himself fully competent to vindicate with ability the claims of his constituents. It appears, from what has been developed in the discussion of the bill now under consideration, that this is a claim for property destroyed by the Cherokee Indians, about the period of the commencement of hostilities between that tribe and the United States. It appears, also, that one of the parties in the same boat has been indemnified by an act of Congress for his property destroyed by the same Indians at the same time; and that another claim of considerable magnitude was allowed and paid to the family of Pettigrew, for a similar destruction of property, under circumstances in all respects like that which is the subject of the present discussion.

John Whitman.

It seems, from the course of this debate, that this claim is now resisted, because it is supposed that it will be considered as a precedent, under which the Florida sufferers may claim indemnification. Sir, I rise to protest on this floor against any pre-adjudication of that question, which involves the fortunes and happiness of more than half of the inhabitants of East Florida. That question is too grave and important to be disposed of in advance, upon a petty claim of three hundred dollars, in the decision of which an attempt is made to establish a principle reversing established precedents, to be used as a pretext for rejecting the claims of the people of Florida, when they shall be presented for discussion, deliberation, and decision. Sir, there is not a member on this floor who has so little respect for his character as not to admit that if we are forced to decide, by some inexorable precedent or established principle, against those whose property has been destroyed in Florida, we shall, in paying that homage to principle and precedent, do an act at which justice and humanity shudder.

These unoffending inhabitants were living in peace and quietude in a Territory under the protection of your laws, in possession of lands purchased from this Government, and remote from the Indian boundary which you yourselves had established, without any knowledge of a participation in the causes of that desolating war which has ravaged the largest portion of East Florida. They are the innocent sufferers, from their unfortunate contiguity to the theatre of operations, where you have attempted, in the execution of the settled policy of the Government, to acquire Indian lands, without affording adequate protection upon the approach of a war resulting from this policy, of which it is now proved that this Government was admonished and notified. It would appear to me, sir, that honorable gentlemen, who have any just sympathy for such unprovoked sufferings, or any respect for the rights of their fellow-citizens, would search for precedents, if such be necessary, to provide for their indemnification, instead of seeking an opportunity by which they may be refused. The deep interest of a large and respectable portion of my constituents in that important question, which in the course of time must come up for decision, has induced me to examine the principles upon which it rests with profound attention.

I undertake to say, sir, whenever that matter comes up for the consideration of this House, that, if there is any such usage or practice as that referred to by three gentlemen in this debate, that the United States are not responsible for losses in war, I hold myself ready to maintain that that usage and practice is in violation of well-established principles of the law of nations, and of the fundamental institutions of society. I deny its application to civilized nations, either upon principle or usage, and I deny that it has been the practice of this Government. I admit that there may be reasons why civilized nations, upon a mere question of expediency or policy, might, from the necessity of the case, and to avoid immense sacrifices, refuse indemnification, because the established maxims of civilized warfare do not justify the destruction of private property. And when any such destruction occurs, it is usually the act of some lawless freebooter, for whom the nation does not consider itself liable. I hold the true principle to be, that, as individuals have associated themselves in communities, surrendering a portion of their natural rights to the Government, in return for their promised protection, every nation is bound to demand redress of the aggressor for the destruction of private property. It was upon this principle that we did it against Spain, France, and England; and it was upon this maxim of national law that we demanded, and Great Britain acquiesced in the justice of the demand, payment for slaves deported from the United States during the last war.

It was upon this principle, too, that an agent was dispatched, under a special act of Congress, to the borders of Canada, to pay for the property destroyed in the late war.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. Love] has told the House that, if this bill passes, and that which he anticipates is to follow for the sufferers of Florida, he shall come forward with a claim for all the losses on the Niagara frontier. Sir, I hold myself ready to show that the principles already established by your own legislation, for the losses on the Niagara frontier, will cover all those which have occurred in Florida by this unprovoked war on those who are its victims. If I am not greatly deceived, payment has been made to every individual whose property was destroyed because it was in the military occupation of the United States. This was done on the ground that, by the rules that civilized warfare has sanctioned, private property of the border inhabitants would not have been destroyed but for that military occupation. Now, sir, apply this doctrine to the case of a savage enemy, one of whose maxims, and, it may be said, the only prominent rule of warfare, is, the indiscriminate destruction of property as well as life. I deny that the principle has any where been established, or that it ever can be, upon any sound consideration of national justice or law, that the inhabitants whose property is destroyed by a barbarian enemy are not entitled to demand payment from their Government. Where is it to be found? The United States, I admit, have generally taken the lands of the Indians by conquest or by treaty, after a general pacification, and indemnified the inhabitants. I can refer to one memorable instance—that of 1814, at the termination of the war with the Creek Indians. It is not my purpose now to go into these questions. I have been waiting for a report from the committee, before I was authorized by the rules of this House to say any thing on the subject of these losses. That report, I hope, will soon be made, when the subject will undergo a thorough examination, due to its intrinsic importance, and to a suffering and ruined people. I only rose to enter my protest, as I now do, against connecting the Florida sufferers with this decision, or against the employment of any such precedent, whatever the decision may be, to that case. Let every question stand on its own merits; and if the people of Florida are to be sacrificed in a savage and bloody war, brought on by the agents of the Government of the United States, and without adequate protection, let it be done by the usual appearances and formalities of a proper consideration of the treaties, laws, and usages, which are applicable to their condition.

Before any question was taken on the bill,

SATURDAY, JANUARY 7.

The honorable Mr. GHOLSON, member from the State of Mississippi, appeared, was qualified, and took his seat.

JOHN WHITMAN.

Among the reports made to-day, Mr. STORER, from the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions, made an unfavorable ~~report~~ <sup>report</sup> on the petition of John Whitman, of Eastbridge, in the State of Massachusetts, for a pension for services performed in the revolutionary war.

Mr. S. moved that the report be referred back to the said committee, with instructions to report a bill granting the prayer of the said petition.

Mr. S. said he had but a few words to say in support of his motion. The petitioner was a man of the age of one hundred and two years, and he asked a pension as a revolutionary soldier. The committee had refused the pension because there was not positive evidence that the petitioner had served six months, as required by the law of 1802. He had proved five months' service, and his own affidavit deposed to a service of six weeks longer, making more than the period of six months. He had received a commission as a lieutenant from the Continental Congress, dated March 20, 1776; and he was known to be a man of unquestionable veracity. Under these circumstances, the majority of the committee thought he had established his claim to a pension. The only question was, whether the one month's service had been sufficiently proved. The probability was that no similar case would again be brought before the consideration of Congress.

Mr. REED was understood, from his personal knowledge of the petitioner, to bear testimony to the upright character and unimpeachable veracity of that individual. Mr. HARPER said that, after the manner in which the petitioner had been spoken of, he felt very reluctant to say a single word in opposition to the motion of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. STORER.] But it involved the very serious question, how far a man's own testimony could be made a justifiable ground on which to grant him a pension. During the last year he (Mr. H.) had had a case under his own charge very similar to the present. The petitioner was not quite so old, but he was nearly 70 years of age. He (Mr. H.) had gone to the department to ascertain what could be done under the circumstances; and he was there informed that, according to the existing law, it was impossible to accept a man's own testimony as the basis for giving him a pension. The individual to whom he alluded had gone 150 miles, and procured testimony as to his services for a portion only of the requisite period; and yet, if the committee had acted on his own testimony, they could have proved that he had served full six months. The application was rejected. He (Mr. H.) would not say that the petitioner might not have been justly entitled to the pension, but the principle on which the petition had been rejected was, that if you accept a man's own testimony in one case it must be accepted in another. This was a dangerous principle, and the House should be careful how it gave sanction to it.

Mr. STORER said that, under the law of 1802, probably one half of all the applicants for pensions applied for them on their own affidavits, and the law itself did not define the nature of the testimony which should be given. In the State from which he came there was no testimony, except that of a traditional character, and the evidence of a very few persons who had survived up to this time. These were cases, therefore, which addressed themselves to the sound discretion of Congress. Frauds might take place, but it was in the exercise of that sound discretion that the prevention of frauds was to be found.

Mr. GRANGER said he regretted that the gentleman from Ohio had pressed this application by a single word beyond the simple statement of the fact that there was now existing in our country a revolutionary soldier, he cared not how short the term of service had been, who was more than 100 years of age, and who had asked for a pension at the hands of the Government.

Although an honorable gentleman over the way [Mr. REED] had, in his boyhood, known the petitioner, he (Mr. G.) imagined that there were very few within that hall who had even seen a man so far advanced in years. The case was one in which the petitioner had not much time to lose. It was like one which Mr. G. remembered to have heard in the Legislature of the State which he had in part the honor to represent, where it was urged in favor of a bill to incorporate a benevolent institution, that the individual who wished to endow it was probably, at that very time, on his deathbed; and that, unless the bill was speedily passed, the institution would never be endowed. It might be said, in the present instance, that the petitioner, a revolutionary soldier, had proved his services within one month of the time which would have entitled him to a pension; and that the House was frittering away the few brief moments which the sands of life had yet to run, in debating whether, by granting him this pittance, they were not about to establish a most dangerous precedent. For himself, it was his sincere desire that there might be other revolutionary soldiers of that age who could avail themselves of this precedent, if indeed the patriotism of the House should be found equal to its adoption.

Mr. WARDWELL said that he thought the present application should be received as all similar applications heretofore had been. A general bill had already been reported from the committee, providing for cases in which the term of service amounted only to three months; and if that bill should pass, the petitioner could take advantage of it. He was opposed, therefore, to the present motion.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. GRANGER] had seemed to think that this individual was entitled to a pension merely because he had lived a hundred years. He (Mr. W.) would say that the petitioner was not half as much entitled to a pension as others of less age; because this very fact proved that he, a strong and able-bodied man, living in the State of Massachusetts during the revolutionary war, amidst scenes of bloodshed, desolation, and plunder, served only about three months out of seven long eventful years of his country's struggles. Mr. W. contended that the very fact of his age told strongly against him. He was willing to give any man a pension who had served his country during the war, even if he had only cried "huzzas," and done no more. But when a man, at that time only forty-five years of age, and who might have done good service in his country's need, had given her only three months of his time, he thought it was not a case about which their tears should flow or their hearts be broken. There was, moreover, scarcely proof that he had served three months—scarcely proof that he had served at all. He was a man who gave directions and made arrangements for other men to go to battle, but who staid at home himself.

Mr. RENCHER said there was much good sense in the remarks of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. WARDWELL.] He (Mr. R.) would inquire of the gentleman from Ohio, whether the petitioner had assigned any good reason why, during the whole revolutionary war, he had only served three months.

Mr. STORER said the gentleman from New York [Mr. WARDWELL] was under a misapprehension as to the time of the petitioner's service. He had served more than three months. He was of a very respectable family, a man of influence in the part of the country in which he lived, and was, at the time referred to, a deacon of the church. He had done more in recruiting men, and in bringing the military together, than any other man in that section. Although only five months in service, all his acts show him to have been a good whig of that day; and Mr. S. thought that, at this distant period, it was invidious to speak of his age in the manner of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. WARDWELL.]

Mr. REED corroborated the statement of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. STORER,] in relation to the personal influence of the petitioner in the section of country in which he resided, and to the exercise of that influence during the revolutionary war.

Mr. PEARCE, of Rhode Island, said his knowledge of what was now before the House was derived from the remarks made by gentlemen who were near him. It appears to me (said he) that the attempt is to bring this aged gentleman into the ship's cabin, through the cabin windows; he is certainly old enough to perform at least one voyage as a foremast hand. If I understand the question before us, it is this: he petitions for a pension, and the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions have reported against him. Some gentlemen are now anxious to have this report reversed, and to allow to the petitioner what he claims. I have no objection to his having what he claims, if, upon a full investigation of it, it should be thought proper to change the character of this report; but I do not find any thing in the question presented that should lift it out of the common operation of the rules of the House.

The invariable practice of the House has been, where an unfavorable report has been made—a report thought by many to be erroneous—to refer such report to the Committee of the Whole House, cause it to be entered upon our calendar of private bills, and, when arrived at, to take the sense of the Committee of the Whole House on the question raised.

Why should we here in the House discuss the merits of a report just made, not printed, and none of the accompanying documents laid before us? We have not the means of judging correctly of its merits, for we have not the information we ought to have, before we are called upon to vote. Sir, in my opinion, this report ought to take the usual course; and if it does, the friends of the petitioner may be able to accomplish all they can desire.

But my friend from New York [Mr. GRANGER] would inquire into nothing but the age of the man; and, as he is found to be one hundred years old and upwards, he is satisfied, and would extend his inquiries no further. Then, Mr. Speaker, it has come to this: longevity is to constitute a claim for a pension; and the man who has lived the longest, and not he who has fought the hardest, is to be pensioned by the Government. This old man, whose constitution has been invigorated by the salt air of Cape Cod, or regions round about there, for seventy or eighty years, where he resided that length of time, and who afterwards went to the State of Ohio, where he must have been retouched by the wand of Hebe, [Mr. P. was under the erroneous impression that he was now an inhabitant of Ohio,] is to be placed upon the pension roll solely on account of his old age, and is to continue a pensioner, no mortal man can tell how long. He has passed the usual time of dying, and is now as likely to live a thousand years as one day.

The gentleman from New York refers to the action of the Legislature of that State to aid him in his argument. There an act of incorporation was hurried through both branches, to enable a man who was in extremis to give away his property to some institution, religious, perhaps, that was capable of receiving it before he died. I do not see the bearing of the case cited; but if what has been stated be in all respects true, the statute of mortmain ought, if it ever were in force in that State, to be re-enacted.

I cannot, out of course, and in violation of our own rules, vote to pension a man whose claim is exclusively founded upon extreme old age. Let it be understood that longevity is to constitute hereafter a claim for a pension, and I will, if I should be a member of the next Congress, (an event, perhaps, not very probable, more especially if I should not be a candidate for re-election,) present to you pension applications in abundance; for I come from a portion of the country the most healthy of any in the world, and where the people live almost forever.

Mr. RENCHER moved to lay the report and accompanying documents on the table; which motion was rejected.

Mr. STORER then withdrew his motion to recommit, with instructions; and

Mr. REED moved to commit the report and documents to the Committee of the Whole House.

The motion prevailed; and the report and documents were committed accordingly.

PUBLIC LANDS.

The unfinished business of the morning hour was the resolution heretofore offered by Mr. C. ALLAN:

“Be it resolved, That a select committee of one member from each State be appointed, whose duty it shall be to inquire into the justice and expediency of making to each of the thirteen original American States, together with each of the States of Vermont, Maine, Kentucky, and Tennessee, such grants of the public lands, for the purposes of education, as will correspond in a just proportion with those heretofore made in favor of the first-named States and Territories, and that said committee have leave to report by bill or otherwise. But to avoid the objection of one State holding land in another, the committee is directed to insert a clause in the bill which they may report, providing that the grants to be made thereby shall be subject to sale under the laws of the General Government now in force, and that the proceeds arising therefrom shall be paid over to the States entitled to the same.”

To which resolution Mr. VINTON heretofore offered the following amendment:

“Resolved, That the said inquiry extend to all the States, and that the said committee be further instructed to inquire into the expediency of inserting a clause in said bill to pay said new States the value of the improvements made by them on the public lands, or to pay to them the amount the public lands would have been assessed for taxes, if they had been private property.”

Mr. JOHNSON, of Louisiana, heretofore moved to amend the resolution “by extending its provisions to all the States of the Union.”

To which amendment Mr. CLATBORNE, of Mississippi, heretofore offered the following amendment:

“And provided that no such grants shall interfere with or be located upon the claim or improvement of any actual settler on the public lands.”

Mr. LANE, who was entitled to the floor, having risen to address the House—

Mr. C. ALLAN requested the gentleman from Indiana to yield the floor for a moment, to enable him to offer a modification of the first part of the preamble thereto, by substituting the word “grants,” for “donations.”

Mr. LANE having declined yielding the floor, the Speaker said the modification could not now be made.

Mr. L. then addressed the House at some length in opposition to the resolution. The resolution (he said) proceeded upon the supposition that nine of the new States, together with one Territory, had received upwards of eleven millions of acres of the public lands as a donation. This proposition was either true or it was untrue. If it was true, he contended it was unequal and unjust, so far as it regarded the new States. If it was not true, it was an insult offered to those nine States, and the suffering and bleeding Territory of Florida, as well as the members who represent those States on this floor. The resolution proposed to give a certain portion of the public lands to the seventeen old States; and this was unjust, because, by this proposition, the land was to be meted out to the old States, according to their population at the present time; and, when the new States had received their portion, they did not number one third their present population. According to this apportionment, Maryland, with a population of only half a million, would receive more of these lands than Indiana with eight hundred thousand citizens, and more than Ohio with a million and a half. And Kentucky, with a much smaller population, would receive more than Indiana or Ohio. It would be unjust to carry this resolution into effect, because the lands granted to the new States were not only received when the population of the States was small, but when the lands were an unbroken wilderness, when there were no roads, no mills, no meeting-houses, no school-houses, and were only inhabited by wild beasts and the roving savages. But now, when all the comforts of life were to be found in the vicinity of those lands, the old States were to come in for a portion of them, equal to those granted to the new States. Who raised the value of those lands? Those who remained at home in ease, comfort, and luxury, or those hardy pioneers who went into the wilderness, subdued the savage, and made it smile and blossom as the rose? The old States, by this resolution, were to come in for a share of these lands, when they were not only easy of access, but when their value was raised by the enterprise and industry of the citizens of the new States. This Mr. L. considered unjust.

Was it true, or was it untrue, that these lands were given to the new States as a donation? He always understood that a donation was a gift, and not founded upon any considerations but those of kindred or affection. Every thing which was founded upon contracts, however trifling the consideration, was a valuable consideration, and was equally binding on the parties, regardless of the amount of the consideration. Then, was the proposition true, that the new States received these lands as a donation? He proceeded, then, to show that they had not received an acre of land, except by a contract founded upon a bona fide consideration, and read extracts from the ordinance admitting Ohio, &c. into the Union, in support of his position. Mr. L. said that by this ordinance it would be seen that the lands had been received by the new States, on the condition that they would not tax the public lands while belonging to the Government, and for five years after their sale; and that the Government should retain the salt springs and all minerals found thereon.

Mr. L. had not concluded his remarks when, the hour having elapsed, Mr. E. WHITTLESEY called for the orders of the day.

Mr. YELL, by consent, offered an amendment to the above resolution, in order that the same might be printed.

And, on motion of Mr. Y., the resolution, with all the pending amendments, were ordered to be printed together.

MILITARY TACTICS.

Mr. W. THOMPSON said it was with extreme reluctance that he intruded himself on the attention of the House at this particular time, but he for some time had had in his possession two important resolutions, which he was anxious to offer, and which would not create any present debate. He asked that they be read for the information of the House.

Mr. JARVIS having objected to the reading of the same,

Mr. THOMPSON moved a suspension of the rule for that purpose; which motion prevailed.

The resolutions were then read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Militia be directed to inquire into the expediency of causing to be published, at the expense of the United States, an edition of the work of General Macomb and Major Cooper, on Tactics, &c., sufficient to furnish each commissioned militia officer in the United States with a copy.

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs be directed to inquire into the expediency of causing an examination to be made, by a board of officers of rank and experience, of the improvements in firearms by Cochran, Hall, Colt, and Baron Hackets, so as to exhibit, in tabular statements, the advantages of each in all important military points of view, and, especially,

1. Celerity of fire.

2. Efficiency of fire.
3. Extent of recoil.
4. Simplicity and cheapness of construction.
5. Durability.
6. Saving in ammunition and appendages.
7. Inconvenience from heated barrels in rapid firing.
8. Number of charges which may be carried by an infantry soldier.
9. Advantages when used against a charge by cavalry.
10. Advantages when used by cavalry.

Mr. THOMPSON then moved a suspension of the rule to enable him to offer the said resolutions; which motion was rejected. So the rule was not suspended.

STATE OF MICHIGAN.

Mr. THOMAS asked the general consent of the House to take up the bill from the Senate, then lying on the Speaker's table, entitled "An act to provide for the admission of the State of Michigan into the Union, upon an equal footing with the original States." Objection being made,

Mr. VANDERPOEL moved a suspension of the rules for the purpose; which was agreed to: Ayes 119, noes 2. The bill was then read a first and second time.

Mr. THOMAS said he was instructed by the Committee on the Judiciary to move that the further consideration of this bill be postponed until Tuesday next, and that it be made the special order for that day, and each succeeding day thereafter, Fridays and Saturdays excepted, from and after the hour of one o'clock, until disposed of.

Mr. T. remarked that it was proper he should take that occasion to say that, in the Judiciary Committee, as was doubtless the case in that House, there was a wide difference of opinion as to the mode of action the House itself should adopt, in disposing of this bill, when it should come up for consideration. Mr. T. was about proceeding, when

The CHAIR interposed, and reminded the gentleman that the motion was not debatable.

Mr. ROBERTSON moved that the bill be committed to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and be made the special order of the day for Tuesday next.

The CHAIR remarked that the motion to postpone took precedence.

Mr. JARVIS inquired whether, if the bill should be committed, it would be competent for a bare majority of the House to take it up and consider it.

The CHAIR replied that it would be competent for the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, when in committee, to take it up; and it would be competent for a majority of the House to go into Committee of the Whole upon this when all the other orders on the Speaker's table had been disposed of.

Mr. HARDIN wished to make a single remark. The bill involved an appropriation, inasmuch as it provided that Michigan should receive her portion of the surplus money. Now, whether the bill should be considered by the House as embracing an appropriation or not, Mr. H. considered it virtually—

The CHAIR said he was compelled to arrest debate. The motion to make the bill the special order, thereby giving it precedence over all other business, being one of priority, could not, under the rules, be debated. He added that it would require a vote of two thirds to carry the motion.

Mr. ADAMS expressed a hope that that motion would prevail.

The question, being taken, was lost: Ayes 99, noes 71—not two thirds.

The motion of Mr. ROBERTSON, to commit, then recurring—

Mr. THOMAS rose and said it was his original purpose, as it was then his wish, not to interpose between the business of the House; and he therefore moved to postpone the further consideration of this bill until Tuesday next.

This motion took precedence of the other.

Mr. ROBERTSON said he would state, in a few words, the grounds upon which he had made the motion to commit. It was not with a view to produce a protracted debate, but because it appeared to him that a bill of such magnitude as this, providing for the admission of a State into the Union, demanded such a commitment if any bill ever did. If bills of this character were not to be committed to a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, he could imagine no bill deserving to be committed to that committee.

But there was an additional reason. The bill, though not in direct terms, did, in substance, contain a provision for an appropriation of public money; for it placed the State of Michigan, in regard to the distribution of the surplus treasure, upon the same footing with the other States. What was the effect of that provision? The right to receive a large portion of the public money, with the possibility that not one dollar of it would ever be demanded back again; thereby, in effect, contemplating a final disposition of it. Upon that ground, he moved that the bill be committed to a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The motion to postpone was agreed to: Ayes 95, noes not counted.

The CHAIR, in reply to a question from a member, said that when the bill came up on Tuesday, it would be open to all the other motions made that day.

The House then passed to the private orders, and took up the bill for the relief of the representatives of

WILLIAM ANDERSON.

The debate was continued by Messrs. SHIELDS, EVERETT, and WARD, when

Mr. HOWELL called for the yeas and nays on ordering the bill to be engrossed; which were ordered, and were: Yeas 52, nays 96. So the bill was rejected.

Some other private business was transacted; after which,

The House adjourned.

MONDAY, JANUARY 9.

FOREIGN AUTHORS.

Mr. ADAMS rose and said he was desirous to make the general inquiry, whether any member of the House was charged with a petition from the authors of Great Britain to the Congress of the United States. If any gentleman was charged with such a petition, he (Mr. A.) had nothing further to state; he did not know but that the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means [Mr. CAMBRELENG] had such a petition in his hands.

Mr. A. explained that his reason for making the inquiry was, that he had received a letter from a respectable person in England, Miss Harriet Martineau, enclosing a printed address or petition from certain authors of Great Britain to the Congress of the United States; and although the request was very distinct that he would favor the object of the petition, yet no positive request was made that he would present it. As the petition was merely a printed paper, without any signature, he did not feel himself at liberty to present it, if, as he presumed, there was in the possession of any other member of the House, who would present it, a petition regularly signed.

Mr. CAMBRELENG said he had no such paper in his possession.

And as it did not appear that any other member was charged with the presentation of the same, Mr. ADAMS said he would wait another week or two; and if a formal petition should not be presented by that time, he would present the one which had been forwarded to him.

ABOLITION OF SLAVERY.

Mr. ADAMS offered to present the petition of one hundred and fifty women, whom he stated to be the wives and daughters of his immediate constituents, praying for the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia; and moved that the petition be read.

Mr. GLASCOCK objected to its reception.

Mr. ADAMS said that, in reference to the reception of the petition, he did not know that he had any observations to make, except that he considered that the obligation rested on the House to receive this petition, and he felt himself bound by his duty to present it.

Mr. BOON rose to a question of order. He would inquire whether, under the rule, a petition could be debated on the day of its presentation.

The SPEAKER said that, under a decision made at the last session of Congress, and which had been sanctioned by a large majority of the House, the question of "reception" was not included in the 45th rule, and that therefore it was debateable at the time the petition was presented.

Mr. ADAMS said he had not expected that any objection would have been made to the reception of this petition, inasmuch as one petition of a similar character, presented by himself, had already been received. At the last session of Congress, after much consideration and debate, it had been decided, as formally as any thing could be, that petitions of this description should be received; and the House had made a special order as to the manner in which they should be treated after they had been received. He considered that that precedent was good, at least so far as that the petition should be received. The decision of the House at the last session of Congress went quite far enough towards suppressing the right of petition in the citizen, and quite far enough towards the suppression of the freedom of speech in this House. It was proposed now to go one step further: the motion of the gentleman from Georgia went to settle the question, that a petition so interesting and important as the one under discussion could be presented, and should not be received—a proposition directly in the face of the constitution itself. Now, he hoped that the people of this country would be spared the mortification and the injustice and the wrong which would be inflicted upon them by their immediate representatives, by a decision that such petitions should not be received. No such example had been given. It was, indeed, true that all discussion, all freedom of speech, all freedom of the press, on this subject, had, within the last twelve months, been violently assailed; and assailed, too, in every form in which the liberties of the people could be assailed. This was the truth. He had lamented the decisions and determination of the House at the last session of Congress, even so far as they went. He considered them as outrages on the constitution of the country and on the freedom of the people. The present proposition proposed to go one step further. He hoped that step would not be taken, and that it would not receive the sanction of that House. It was always in the power of the House to reject petitions, after they had been considered; and the House, by a large and overwhelming majority, had given evidence enough to the country that they had no disposition to favor petitions of this character; that they were ready, too, to state their views against such petitions, and to reject the prayer of them. Amongst the outrages that would be endured by that portion of the people of this country whose aspirations were raised to the greatest improvement that could possibly be effected in the condition of the human race—the total abolition of slavery on earth—that of calumny was one of the most glaring. Their petitions were not only to be treated with contempt, as at the last session of Congress, but the petitioners themselves were to be loaded with foul and infamous imputations, poured upon a class of citizens as pure and as virtuous as the inhabitants of any section of the Union. Such, he had no doubt, were the petitioners whose names were appended to the present petition. They were females. To men animated by that sentiment which does honor to human nature, this fact alone, in his opinion, was a recommendation for the reception of the petition.

He had said that the petition was signed by one hundred and fifty females, the wives and daughters of his immediate constituents. They were, many of them, sisters and mothers of his constituents. Every member of the House (said Mr. A.) has, or had, a mother; and he appealed to the feelings of every member to say whether, in the whole class of human affections, there was one sentiment more honorable, or more divested of earthly alloy, than that which every man must entertain for his mother. Let him put a case, and suppose that the own mother of any member of the House was one of the petitioners. He (Mr. A.) would ask that member whether he would reject and turn the petition out of doors, and say that he would not even hear it read? The petition was perfectly respectful in its terms and language; it consisted of nothing more than four or five lines, which could be read in half a minute. What! (said Mr. A.,) do I speak to men? and do they say that they will not even listen to a petition coming from such a source? What had he, or this House, to fear from female petitioners? Were insurrection, and bloodshed, and slaughter, to be apprehended from the petition of women? There was no such disposition; there was nothing of an inflammatory character or tendency contained in the petition itself. He hoped that the gentleman who had objected to its reception would withdraw his objection. He hoped so, for the sake of that gentleman's character as a man; for the sake of his character as a son; and he hoped that no senseless or cowardly influence would deter that gentleman from doing justice to these females, so far as to allow the petition to be received without objection.

Mr. GLASCOCK said it was well known what position he had taken on this question during the last session of Congress; and if, on the present occasion, he were to accede to the proposition of the gentleman from Massachusetts, which, however, he had no disposition to do, it would be inconsistent with, and an entire abandonment of, the principle which, at that time, he and those acting with him had assumed. In reference to the female petitioners, to whom the gentleman had so eloquently alluded, he would say that no man would show or pay higher regard to a petition coming from such a quarter, on a proper subject, than he (Mr. G.) would show. But, from the course pursued, and the scenes presented at the last session, and from indications at the present, it was time that all those members of the House, who believed they had the constitutional right to reject these petitions, should now exercise that privilege which they conceived to be secured to them by the constitution, and to have their votes recorded against petitions of this character.

If this were a new subject, upon which the sense of this House had never been taken, and a petition, emanating from such a source, had been presented, he would have responded to it as promptly as any member on the floor. But did not the gentleman from Massachusetts know that, even if the petition had been received, it would, by the almost unanimous vote of the House, without being read, and without action of any kind being had upon it, be laid upon the table, where, as the gentleman himself had once said, it would sleep "in the tomb of all the Capulets?" It was indeed true that the petition had emanated from wives, and mothers, and daughters; but he must say that he doubted very much whether all petitions of this nature were not presented for effect of some kind or other, and that these females were improperly influenced by men in the community in which they resided. The gentleman had said that those who had mothers and daughters ought to pay some regard to this petition, otherwise it would be to treat them, as it were, with disrespect. If he (Mr. G.) were situated as was the gentleman from Massachusetts, had seen the many votes which had been taken on this subject, and been a witness to the excitement which had been produced by means of similar applications, his (Mr. G's) language to a mother and a daughter would have been very different from the language of that gentleman. He (Mr. G.) would have told them that their petition might be just and right, according to the views of those by whom they were immediately surrounded, yet that they ought not to raise their voices at this time; that their petitions were creating an excitement which ought to be put down, and he would advise them to pause in their course. Did the gentleman from Massachusetts, in appealing to the feelings of the House, suppose that the people of the South were not as much entitled to sympathy as those who were less delicately placed? In the mind of any reflecting man, could any good result from the reception of these petitions? They were not to be acted upon, and no good could result from their presentation, though evil might.

The gentleman from Massachusetts had thought proper to advise him, (Mr. G.,) for the sake of his character as a man, to withdraw his objection. Were he to do so, he would prove recreant not only to his own feelings, but to the feelings of thousands who sent him here, and whose interests he represented. His only object was, that those who agreed with him that the petition should not be received might have an opportunity of recording their votes, and of showing what their course was to be. He wished to have a vote on the direct question, "Shall the petition be received?" so that those who believed they had the constitutional right to reject it might, by their vote, record that opinion on the journals of the House.

Mr. PARKS said that, believing this discussion could be productive of no good, but might be productive of evil, he would move that the preliminary motion on the reception of the petition be laid on the table.

In reply to an inquiry from Mr. GLASCOCK,

The SPEAKER said that the effect of this motion, if carried, would be simply to arrest the action of the House on the petition, and not to lay the petition itself on the table.

Mr. REED called for the yeas and nays on that motion; which were ordered, and, being taken, were: Yeas 130, nays 69.

So the preliminary motion was laid on the table.

Mr. ADAMS said that, if he had understood the decision of the Speaker in this case, it was not the petition itself which was laid on the table, but the motion to receive. Now, in order to save the time of the House, he wished to give notice that he should call up that motion for decision every day, so long as he should be permitted to do so by the House; because he should not consider his duty accomplished so long as the petition was not received, and so long as the House had not decided that it would not receive it. This was an operation to which he could not consent.

Mr. PINCKNEY rose to a question of order, and inquired if there was now any question before the House.

JAN. 9, 1837.]

Abolition of Slavery.

[H. OF R.]

The SPEAKER said he had understood the gentleman from Massachusetts as merely giving notice of a motion hereafter to be made. In doing so, it certainly was not in order to enter into debate.

Mr. ADAMS said that, so long as freedom of speech was allowed to him as a member of that House, he would call up that question until it should be decided.

[Mr. ADAMS was called to order.]

Mr. A. said he would then have the honor of presenting to the House the petition of 228 women, the wives and daughters of his immediate constituents; and, as a part of the speech which he intended to make, he would take the liberty of reading the petition. It was not long, and would not consume much time.

Mr. GLASCOCK objected to the reception of the petition.

Mr. ADAMS proceeded to read that the petitioners, inhabitants of South Weymouth, in the State of Massachusetts, impressed with "the sinfulness of slavery, and keenly aggrieved by its existence in a part of our country over which Congress"—

Mr. PINCKNEY rose to a question of order. Had the gentleman from Massachusetts a right, under the rule, to read the petition?

The SPEAKER said the gentleman from Massachusetts had a right to make a statement of the contents of the petition.

Mr. PINCKNEY desired the decision of the Speaker as to whether a gentleman had a right to read a petition.

Mr. ADAMS said he was reading the petition as a part of his speech, and he took this to be one of the privileges of a member of the House. It was a privilege which he would exercise till he should be deprived of it by some positive act.

The SPEAKER repeated that the gentleman from Massachusetts had a right to make a brief statement of the contents of the petition. It was not for the Speaker to decide whether that brief statement should be made in the gentleman's own language, or whether he should look over the petition, and take his statement from that.

Mr. ADAMS. At the time my friend from South Carolina—

The SPEAKER said the gentleman must proceed to state the contents of the petition.

Mr. ADAMS. I am doing so, sir.

The SPEAKER. Not in the opinion of the Chair.

Mr. ADAMS. I was at this point of the petition:

"Keenly aggrieved by its existence in a part of our country over which Congress possesses exclusive jurisdiction in all cases whatever"—

Loud cries of "Order! order!"

Mr. A. proceeded:

"Do most earnestly petition your honorable body"—

Mr. CHAMBERS, of Kentucky, rose to a point of order.

Mr. A. proceeded:

"Immediately to abolish slavery in the District of Columbia"—

Mr. CHAMBERS reiterated his call to order, and the Speaker told Mr. ADAMS to take his seat.

Mr. A. proceeded, (with great rapidity of enunciation and in a very loud tone of voice:)

"And to declare every human being free who sets foot upon its soil."

Mr. CHAMBERS insisted on his point of order, and the Speaker again, with great earnestness of manner, told the gentleman from Massachusetts to take his seat.

Whereupon Mr. A. yielded the floor.

Mr. CHAMBERS then stated his point of order. The rule of the House provided that every member, on presenting a petition, should state briefly the substance of it. Could that rule be evaded by any gentleman who chose to avow that he would read the petition as a part of his speech? He would be the last man in the world to disturb any gentleman in his remarks, but he thought this course entirely out of order.

The SPEAKER read the rule of the House applicable to the question. It is as follows:

"Rule 45.—Petitions, memorials, and other papers addressed to the House, shall be presented by the Speaker, or by a member in his place; a brief statement of the contents thereof shall verbally be made by the introducer, and shall not be debated or decided on the day of their being first read, unless where the House shall direct otherwise, but shall lie on the table, to be taken up in the order in which they were read."

The SPEAKER said he would give his decision if it should be insisted on; but he thought much time might be saved by not pressing a decision at this time, because he understood that the gentleman from Massachusetts had gone through the greater part of the contents of the petition.

Mr. CHAMBERS said that his objection was as to the principle, whether a member had a right to read a petition as a part of his speech. He insisted, respectfully, on having the decision of the Chair.

The SPEAKER said that he decided, then, that it was not in order for a member to read a petition, whether it was long or short. By the provision of the rule, whatever petition a member might present, he was bound to make, verbally, "a brief statement of the contents." It would be an abuse of the intent of the rule for a member to rise before a petition was received, and when its reception was objected to, and proceed to read a long memorial. So far as the principle was concerned, it was the same in the case of a short memorial as a long one; otherwise the rule, which looked to economy in the time of the House, would be a nullity.

Mr. ADAMS said that, as he intended to appeal from the decision of the Chair, he would request the member from Kentucky to reduce his point of order to writing, and he would likewise request the Speaker to reduce his decision to writing. He appealed from any decision which went to establish the principle that a member of the House should not have the power to read what he chose. He had never before heard of such a thing. If this practice was to be reversed, let the decision stand upon record, and let it appear how entirely the freedom of speech was suppressed in this House. If the reading of a paper was to be suppressed in his own person, so help him God, he would only consent to it as a matter of record.

The SPEAKER repeated the grounds of his decision, and, in support of it, read from Jefferson's Manual a clause setting forth, in substance, "that a member had no right to read a paper; but that such rigor was not practised except there was an intentional or gross abuse of the time of the House. Strictly, also, by that rule, a member could read his own speech, if written," &c. The Speaker said his decision was founded mainly on the 45th rule of the House, which required that a "brief statement of the contents" should alone be made. He was of opinion that it was an invasion of this rule to permit a member, as matter of right, to read any paper he chose to present, as a part of that brief statement.

Mr. PATTON rose to express his concurrence in the decision of the Speaker. He thought, however, it would have been better not to have raised the question in this form, because, substantially, the gentleman from Massachusetts would effect his object when he made his speech on the question of "reception;" a question which the House had decided to be debatable. He thought it would be better not to consume the time of the House in the discussion, and he hoped the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. CHAMBERS] would withdraw his objection, and not appeal from the decision of the Chair.

H. OF R.]

Abolition of Slavery.

Mr. CHAMBERS said that, if he had the power to appeal, he did not intend to exercise it. But the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. PARROTT] was mistaken as to the practical effect of the question which he (Mr. C.) had raised. A member could not do by a sideward that which he had not the power to do directly. There was no member of the House whom he would indulge so much on a subject as the gentleman from Massachusetts; but he (Mr. C.) thought there was an important principle involved, which ought to be decided. The House must either give a man the right to read every thing he liked, or they must restrict him in every instance. He could not withdraw his objection.

The point of order was debated further by Messrs. BRIGGS, HARPER, CHAMBERS, and ADAMS, the latter gentleman contending that, inasmuch as the whole petition was in five lines, he could not himself give verbally a more "brief statement of the contents" than the petition itself gave.

The SPEAKER presented, in writing, the substance of his decision, that it was not in order for a member to read the whole petition if objected to, but that he had only the right to make "a brief statement of the contents thereof."

Mr. ADAMS said he proposed to withdraw his appeal, in order to save the time of the House, if the gentleman from Kentucky would permit him to complete his "brief statement of the contents" of the petition. It was, indeed, so brief, that to read the petition in its own language was the briefest statement that could be made.

Mr. A. then read from the petition that the petitioners "respectfully announced their intention to present the same petition yearly before this honorable body, that it might at least be a memorial in the holy cause of human freedom, that they had done what they could."

These words were read amidst tumultuous cries for order from every part of the House. And order having at length been restored,

Mr. ADAMS withdrew his appeal.

The question then recurred on the objection of Mr. GLASCOCK to the reception of the petition.

After some remarks from Mr. DAWSON, deprecating any excitement on the subject, and condemning, in strong terms, the conduct of the fanatics in agitating it—

Mr. BOON moved to lay the preliminary motion of reception on the table.

Mr. GLASCOCK urged the House to take the vote on the direct question of reception.

After some desultory conversation on points of order,

Mr. BOON withdrew his motion to lay the preliminary motion of reception on the table.

Mr. A. MANN said that, as this question had been most fully discussed at the last session of Congress, and as the House had at that time resolved that these petitions should be laid on the table without being referred or printed, he would, to save the time of the House, call for the previous question.

And the House seconded the call: Ayes 114, noes not counted.

And the House determined that the main question should now be put.

Mr. PHILLIPS called for the yeas and nays on the main question; which were ordered.

And the main question, "Shall the petition be received?" was then taken, and decided in the affirmative, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, H. Allen, Anthony, Bailey, Beale, Bean, Bockee, Bond, Boon, Borden, Bovee, Boyd, Briggs, Brown, Buchanan, Burns, W. B. Calhoun, Cambreleng, Carr, Carter, Casey, G. So the petition was received.

Mr. HAYNES moved that the petition be laid on the table.

Mr. ADAMS moved that it be referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia.

The SPEAKER said the motion to lay on the table had precedence; and Mr. ADAMS called for the yeas and nays on that motion; which were ordered.

Mr. PINCKNEY inquired if the motion of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HAYNES] was susceptible of amendment.

The SPEAKER said it was not.

Mr. PINCKNEY asked the gentleman from Georgia to withdraw his motion, in order to enable him to substitute a more comprehensive proposition; the object of which was, that not only this memorial, but all others of a similar character, should be laid on the table. He wished to offer a resolution to that effect.

Mr. HAYNES said, if his motion was susceptible of such an amendment, he was willing it should be made.

The SPEAKER said that such an amendment was not in order.

And the question on the motion to lay the petition on the table was then taken, and decided in the affirmative, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Ash, Barton, Bean, Bell, Black, Bockee, Boon, Bovee, Boyd, Brown, Buchanan, Bunch, Burns, Bynum, John Calhoun, Cambreleng, Campbell, Carr, Carter, Casey, George Chambers, John Chambers, Chaney, Chapman, Chapin, Chetwood, Nathaniel H. So the petition was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. ADAMS then presented a third petition, from forty inhabitants of the town of Dover, in the county of Norfolk, Massachusetts, praying for the abolition of slavery and the slave trade in the District of Columbia, and moved that the petition be read.

Mr. LAWLER objected to its reception.

Mr. UNDERWOOD said that he had just voted against receiving a petition presented by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. ADAMS,] but he had been overruled by a large majority of the House. The petition was received, and laid on the table, there to sleep the sleep of death. No sooner is this done, than the same gentleman offers another petition of the same character, praying for the abolition of slavery and the slave trade in the District of Columbia, coming from a portion of the people of Massachusetts represented by him. I have been (said Mr. U.) a silent witness of the proceedings had at the present and preceding sessions of Congress on this exciting subject; but I now rise to assign a few reasons for the vote I have just given, and for the vote which I shall again give against the reception of the petition now presented.

Slavery in the United States exhibits two distinct aspects. The one is national, the other local. It is national so far as the constitution of the United States makes it the basis of representation and taxation, by requiring three fifths of the slaves to be added to the whole number of free persons. It is also national so far as the constitutional provision requires those slaves who escape and flee to the non-slaveholding States to be delivered up; and so far as the legislation of Congress, in pursuance of this or any other article of the constitution, operates upon the subject. It is local so far as the legislation of the States controls the subject. The constitutions and laws of the States which tolerate slavery, and prescribe the treatment of the slave, defining the relations he bears to the State as a person, and those between him and a master as property, are local. Congress has no jurisdiction over these local regulations, and can nowhere alter or abrogate them, unless it be in this District. The laws of Virginia and Maryland, which have instituted slavery in this District, and which now uphold it, are local, and not national. Their effect is confined to the ten miles square, and they operate upon the people within the District exclusively.

Now, sir, I desire to know what right (for I shall consider the question as one of right) the people of Massachusetts have to petition us to repeal or modify the local regulations and laws which do not operate upon them, or within their territory, but which govern a different people, who do not complain, and who may be entirely satisfied, and wholly opposed to any change. We are told that we must receive and act upon this and all similar petitions, lest we subvert the sacred right of petition. I deny that there is any right of petition, where the grievance complained of does not operate upon the petitioners. I admit that you may receive any petition through courtesy, without regard to its object or the quarter whence it comes; and in the general it would be best to do so. But the attempt is made to force these abolition petitions upon the consideration of Congress as a matter of right; and it is against that attempt, upon such a pretext, I protest. Sir, these petitioners, as I conceive, are officiously intermeddling with the affairs of other people, when they had better mind their own business.

If the people of Massachusetts are dissatisfied, and feel aggrieved by the existence of slavery in any one of its national aspects, they have a right to petition for redress; and we are bound, whenever petitions come before us, as of right, to hear their complaints, and to decide upon them. The right of the citizen to petition is moral and political, and imposes a corresponding obligation on those to whom the petition is addressed to hear and decide. These rights, however, are not of that class denominated perfect or legal, because they cannot be judicially enforced. If any portion of the people of Massachusetts were to petition us to modify or change the laws prescribing the mode for reclaiming fugitive slaves, or pray us to recommend to the States an alteration of the constitution, so as to place representation and taxation upon the basis of free white population exclusively, I should feel it to be a duty to receive and consider such petitions, because they relate to national topics—to matters affecting and operating upon the people of Massachusetts, growing out of the existence of slavery. But when the people of Massachusetts, or of any other State, begin to pry into the local regulations of another people, and to complain of them, I feel no obligation of duty to listen.

I will illustrate the distinction I have endeavored to present by putting a few cases. Suppose the inhabitants of Europe, or any portion of them, were to petition us to repeal our tariff laws, and to raise revenue by a direct tax on land only, would we be bound to receive and act upon such petition? Certainly not. Why? Because our system of taxation, whatever it may be in reference to foreign nations, is local, and their people have no right to interfere. The operation of this Government with foreign States is such that our laws may often affect the interests of foreigners; and, if they should affect those interests injuriously, and in violation of the laws of nations, foreigners thus injured might rightfully petition us for redress; because the welfare of mankind requires obedience to the principles of international law, and by the tacit consent of all civilized nations these principles have been adopted in such manner as to make them one people in respect to the code of nations; and hence a foreigner who suffers from a violation of these principles has the same right to petition for redress that a citizen would have. But this would give the foreigner no right to petition on a subject touching our domestic regulations; and, if he did so petition, it would be optional with us to receive or reject; and if we did the last, he could not complain that his rights were contemned.

Suppose the petitioners who now come before us had addressed their petition to the Legislature of Kentucky, praying for the abolition of slavery in that State: would the Legislature of Kentucky be bound to receive and act upon it? Certainly not. Why? Because slavery in Kentucky is a local, domestic regulation, in reference to the people of Massachusetts. Kentuckians possess just the same right, by petition, to call on the Legislature of Massachusetts to change her laws in regard to apprentices, paupers, or infants, as the Yankee (and I use the term in no offensive sense) has to call on Kentucky to abolish slavery. If Kentuckians were to forward such a petition in the most respectful terms, if it was received and read, after its contents had been briefly stated by the mover, it would be an act of courtesy, and not of strict right. If year after year petitions of the same kind were forwarded, and that, too, after the first had been considered and disposed of, the Legislature to whom they were addressed might justly say to the petitioners, "You have evinced an unbecoming importunity, an over anxiety to interfere in our domestic and local affairs; and however praiseworthy your motives, as it is not a matter of right on your part, we will no longer submit to annoyance. We reject your petition without hearing it read, the mover having briefly stated its contents."

Abolition of Slavery.

[JAN. 9, 1837.]

Of the soundness of the foregoing principles I think it will be difficult to create a doubt; and I presume, if my remarks are met in debate, an attempt will be made to show that slavery in this District is not a local but a national matter, and hence concerns every portion of the American people. I admit, if it be not local, but national, then the petition offered should not only be received, but it ought to be referred, and duly considered. How is slavery in this District converted into a national instead of a local question? Is it because the Congress of the United States, being a national body, may legislate concerning it? The nationality of the body does not prove that its legislation in its operation and consequences must be national and general. It is a proposition too clear to admit of dispute, that all our Legislatures, both State and national, pass hundreds and thousands of acts, local and private, which do not affect the whole State or nation. It is preposterous to assert that, because Congress is a national body, it can in no case legislate for local or private purposes. In the general, its local and private legislation is in furtherance of some of the constitutional powers vested for general national purposes; and whenever that is the case, I admit that the principle which governs such legislation is of national concern, and that all or any of our constituents have a right to be heard on this floor in relation to the principle, by petition, memorial, or remonstrance. Thus, an act allowing a pension to A B, although private, may involve a principle of national importance. The legislation of Congress over the District of Columbia, so far as the rights of property of the citizens are concerned, is a very different thing, and no way analogous in principle to the passage of a private pension law. The legislation for this District with a view to protect the citizen, unconnected with the Government, in the enjoyment of life, liberty, and property, does not possess a single national aspect. It is exclusively local, and confined to the ten miles square, and has no operation whatever upon the people of Massachusetts, unless they should happen to be visitors here. Congress, by the constitution, has the exclusive right to legislate for this District, and it may be said that such a power would never have been conferred but for a national purpose. Concede it, and nothing is gained from the concession against my argument. All that the constitution intended by the grant of exclusive legislative power to Congress over the District was to place the members of Congress, the executive head of the Government, and all its officers, necessarily congregated at one point, beyond the control and influence of State laws, which in many cases might have been made harassing and oppressive; so much so as to prevent their strict attention to official duty. To escape the danger which might have resulted from State legislation over the officers, legislative, executive, and judicial, of the General Government, the constitution conferred the power of exclusive legislation over the District on Congress. So far as the power is exercised for the benefit of the officers of the Government, and to enable them to proceed with the discharge of their duties free from extraneous and deleterious influences, it may be national. But when it is exercised for the protection of the property, or for the purpose of declaring what shall or shall not be property in the District, it is strictly local, and not general or national; and the laws which emanate from its exercise, for the benefit of the people of the District, are as unconnected with the people of the States as are the laws of the several States with the people of any other State.

The fact that the people of Massachusetts may come here occasionally as visitors gives them no right to petition Congress for a change in the local laws passed for the benefit of the people of the District. If that fact is made the basis of their right to petition, it would equally authorize them to petition the Legislatures of every State tolerating slavery for its abolition; for they have a right to visit in all the States, and are "entitled to all privileges and immunities of citizens" in the State to which they go.

I will put another case illustrative of my idea. I will show that the people of the same State, in many cases, have no right to petition their State Legislatures concerning public matters in their own States. A township or incorporated city imposes taxes, or makes regulations for the government of the people within the township or city. The inhabitants of a distant township hear of the proceedings, their philanthropy is excited, they perceive, or fancy they do, great oppression, and memorialize the Legislature to put an end to prevailing abuses in the township or city about which they have heard much, but within whose borders they never were in the whole course of their lives. How ought the Legislature to treat such a petition, especially when the people of the township or city subject to the oppressive laws made no complaint? The proper response, in my opinion, would be to say to the petitioners, "You are conceited; you have a high opinion of yourselves, and a mean opinion of your neighbors, and you presume to judge of laws and regulations of which you have no experience, more correctly than those who feel their operation. We are not disposed to encourage your vanity. We reject your petition without reading it, being briefly informed of its contents."

If my constituents were to send me a petition in favor of abolishing slavery in this District, and request me to present it to this House, as an act of courtesy to them I should offer it; but as an act of duty to the people of this District, whose representative I am, being constituted such by the constitution, I would vote against its reception. I am a Representative on this floor, having a three-fold duty to perform: first, I am to legislate for the whole nation, and to watch over the general interests of the whole people; secondly, I am to keep an eye upon the local interests of my particular State and district; and, thirdly, I am to attend to the local interests of the people of this District. I mean to make all these duties harmonize. If any of my immediate constituents should ever so far forget themselves as, by petition or otherwise, to instruct me to change the laws and usages of the people of this District, I mean to tell them, that although I am indebted to their kindness and partiality for my election when elected, I feel myself bound to legislate for the people of this District upon my own observation of their situation, and my knowledge of their wants, as derived from my conversations and association with them. I look upon that as my duty under the constitution, and I will never consent to be made the instrument by one portion of my constituents to subvert the rights of another portion. To my mind, there is something absurd in the idea of any set of men or women undertaking to interfere with the local laws of a separate people, five hundred or a thousand miles off.

Abolition of Slavery.

But, then, the motives of the petitioners in this case are so pure, it is a pity not to hear them in the cause of religion and freedom! The Saviour of man did not propagate his religion by petitioning legislative assemblies. And the lesson in favor of freedom which the abolitionist teaches is to break up the long-established practices and laws of one people, not at their instance or by their consent, but at the absolute will of a distant people, no way affected by the laws which are to be subverted! Why, sir, if this game is to be successfully played, there is no telling where it will stop; and the next thing we may hear of will be a petition from New England to establish the Blue Law code in this District, and render it unlawful for a man to kiss his wife on Sunday! I beg the New England gentlemen and ladies to desist, or to tell us how far their consciences will require them to go, in petitioning Congress to reform the sins of this District.

I have endeavored to present the grounds of my vote. If you receive the petition, if you are bound to receive it, then, sir, you should refer it and act upon it. My word for it, as long as the decision of this House, just given, stands as the judgment of the House, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ADAMS] will convict you of the grossest inconsistency in refusing to refer petitions of this sort to the appropriate committee. We say to the petitioners, "You come before us as matter of right; but, from motives of policy, we will make no response." Sir, such a course is a mockery of their rights, if they have them. I have endeavored to show that the people of Massachusetts have no right to petition on the subject, and there never will be an end of this exciting question until Congress sustains my views.

Mr. REED said he differed entirely in opinion with the gentleman who had last spoken, [Mr. UNDERWOOD;] and, as he had the charge of a number of memorials of similar character to the one now under consideration, he begged leave to say a few words upon the subject.

Let it be remembered that these memorials, so obnoxious to some members of this House, pray for the abolition of slavery and the slave trade in the District of Columbia. They go no further. The gentleman from Kentucky, who has just sat down, has given a labored argument to prove that the people of Massachusetts, and, of course, the people of any other State in the Union, have no right to petition Congress to repeal or modify the laws in relation to slavery in this District. "He denies the right of petition, when the grievance complained of does not operate upon the petitioners." He denies that the right, secured by the constitution, peaceably to assemble and petition Government for a redress of grievances applies to the present case, because the evil complained of, if any evil exist, is only a national evil, and is no personal grievance to the petitioners.

I cannot for a moment assent to the positions of the gentleman. To my mind, they are subversive of the right of petition and of the rights of a free people. I highly respect the gentleman and his opinions, and am quite sure he views the subject in a very different light.

In my opinion, the right of the citizens of a free and representative Government to petition their representatives for a redress of grievances is a perfect right. It exists independent of the constitution. It must exist where the people are free, and where it does not exist there is despotism. I am aware that, from abundant caution, this sacred right of petition is secured by the constitution. The right so secured is not limited or enlarged by the security. It is a perfect right, which we must never permit to be impaired by ingenious arguments, to avoid the consideration of an unpleasant subject. "It would be doing evil, that good might come." The right is the same, whether the evil complained of be national and remote, or direct and personal.

By the constitution of the United States, Congress exercise exclusive jurisdiction, in all cases whatsoever, over the ten miles square; and that territory is the District of Columbia. Can language be more explicit? The jurisdiction of Congress over this District is exclusive, and extends to all cases whatsoever.

Congress have the sole government of the District. The House of Representatives are a part of Congress, and are the representatives of the people of the United States. Will it be denied that the people whom they represent have a right to petition them for redress of any grievance over which they have jurisdiction? Suppose it were admitted that slavery and the slave trade in the District of Columbia was a national evil, but that the evil was remote in its effects upon distant parts of the country: could it be said that it was no evil or no grievance because not aggravated and direct? Is not each portion of the country a part of the nation? Can any part suffer, and the remaining part not be aggrieved? The part of the constitution which gives exclusive jurisdiction over this District to Congress was not a mere form, or accident; it intended that it should be governed solely by the nation and the representatives of the nation; and the people, whose representatives we are, all have a direct interest in its government, its honor, and its prosperity. If, therefore, in the opinion of any portion of the people of any part of the country, the laws of this District are bad, they are aggrieved. It is a national and personal evil, and they have a right to petition for redress.

The gentleman asks if the inhabitants of Europe, or any part of them, should petition us to repeal our tariff, should we be bound to receive and act upon such petition? And, again, should the petitioners address a petition to the Legislature of Kentucky, praying for the abolition of slavery, would Kentucky be bound to receive and act upon it? I perfectly agree with the gentleman, that if the inhabitants of Europe or Massachusetts should so far forget themselves as to offer such petitions, neither this House nor the Legislature of Kentucky would be under any obligation to notice them. For one plain reason: we have no jurisdiction over the people of Europe; nor has Kentucky any jurisdiction, so far as their State Government extends, over Massachusetts. Of course, the petitioners could have no grievances for which they could claim redress, and have no right to interfere with the grievances of others. Not so with the District of Columbia; it is exclusively governed by Congress; it is a part of the nation, and if illy governed it is a national and individual grievance, and those who feel it have a right to present to us a petition for redress.

I consider the question one of vast importance, as vitally affecting the liberties of the people and the sacred rights of citizens. I regret that great principles must be settled under some excitement, and under an apprehension that no relief could be afforded if the petition was received. I can but think the true construction of the constitution is so plain, and the right of every citizen to petition so clear, that nothing further is necessary but barely to state the principles upon which they are founded; and I forbear to say more upon the subject.

I have been gratified by a vote of this House this day, allowing a petition like the one now before us to be received. I trust we shall not reverse that decision. I do hope, regarding, as I most sincerely and anxiously do, the harmony, peace, and welfare of the United States, North, and South, and West, that these memorials will not be thrown in the faces of the memorialists, nor thrown under the table, nor nailed to the table. I hope they may be received, and not rejected by force, and violence, and insult; and, when received, that they may be committed to a committee of this House. If the petitioners are in error, let the error be shown by a plain and dispassionate report, and an argument which they cannot refute or gainsay. Persecution and violence will never put down a good cause, or even a bad one. I hold the people have a right to petition, and that there is a corresponding obligation on our part to receive them, to refer them, and to decide in favor or against them, according to our sound discretion and best judgment.

Petitions for the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia are not of modern origin. They have been presented annually for many years past; and until last year they have been presented and referred, and treated precisely like other petitions, and have produced very little excitement in this House or elsewhere. I hope we shall return to our former usage, and avoid all unnecessary excitement upon this important and vexing subject.

Mr. BYNUM rose and said he had not intended to have troubled the House with any remark of his upon the subject which was then before it. It had ever been his unfeigned desire that it should have been kept out of the walls of that hall, believing, as he did, that nothing but strife and discord would attend its agitation either in or out of that building. The question of reception he had been disposed to give the go-by, for the sake of the harmony of all parties, and particularly that to which he had the honor to belong. But, sir, said he, this question has been forced upon us and upon the House; and he regretted, exceedingly regretted, that its portentous consequences, view them in whatever shape they might, seem to be defied, dared, and almost courted, by some of the honorable gentlemen of that body. Was it possible that gentlemen would still persevere in a course so detrimental to the well-being of this nation? Was it possible that they could be so deaf to the warning voice of truth, and so blind to the signs of the times, as not to see the direful state to which their conduct, if persisted in, must inevitably lead? His course, since the first day that he took his seat in that House, had been to avoid agitation on that subject; and he had, in good faith, voted for every measure to suppress it.

He knew that there were two parties in that House and in the country in favor of agitation, and for political purposes. He was truly sorry that they existed in any section of the country, and was more so to think that any existed in the section from which he came.

It was to be deprecated that any party, or any set of men, whether to the North or South, should be found to use such means to place them in power; but such there were, and this House and this nation were to feel the effects of their unhallowed purposes.

Sir, said Mr. B., I feel mortified to know that I am called on to vote on a subject upon which I have just voted and have been defeated, and must know that a similar fate awaits me on the decision of this question. Sir, we have been defeated by the imprudence and folly of those who, on this subject, have professed to act with us. It was the weakest stand, as Southern men and slaveholders, we could have taken. It was one in which we had long seen that we must be defeated whenever it was put. Why, then, should gentlemen professing to act with us, holding the same sentiments on this subject, aid in making up an issue in which every man of discernment must have known that defeat was unavoidable? And every defeat upon the most frivolous question on our part gives both strength and encouragement to our enemies. Sir, with politicians of such imprudence, and with so little policy, it is dangerous to act, here or elsewhere.

But to the preliminary question—shall this petition be received? Although we have just been defeated—yes, defeated, sir, and shamefully defeated—by the imprudence of professing friends, I shall still vote against the reception of these diabolical petitions, believing, as I do, that they are fraught with the most alarming, dangerous, and appalling consequences to the well-being of this country. Gentlemen had contended that we were bound to receive all petitions whenever presented. This he denied. True it was that the petitioners had a constitutional and unalienable right guaranteed by the constitution to petition for the redress of grievances, a right which none, as he had heard, had controverted; for himself, he looked on that as one of the most sacred rights of a freeman, and one which, under no circumstances, would he disparage or yield. But whenever the petition was made and presented there, in his judgment this right ended, and the rights of the representatives or legislation commenced. The constitution, said Mr. B., went no further than to declare the right to petition. It could not have gone further, from the very nature of things. Why? Because, said he, if it had, the very existence of your legislative body would have been endangered, and its dignity and character placed entirely in the hands of every senseless and infuriated mob that might choose to degrade or insult you. The most frivolous petitions from women, children, boys, or lunatics, might be received, at a great consumption of the time of this House, and at an enormous expense to the people; and the whole body, under such circumstances, might be converted into scenes of levity and frivolity totally destructive of the dignity and character of wise legislation. Such could never have been the intention of the framers of the constitution; in that august body there was too much wisdom, dignity, and patriotism, to presume it.

As reference had been made to the constitution, he would read the article that had been alluded to, to which, it was contended, made it obligatory on the part of the House to receive those petitions; and he thought its words would be evidence to show that the construction he had put on it was strictly in harmony with the direct spirit and meaning of that instrument. Article the first is in these words:

"Congress shall make no law respecting the establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press; or the right of the people peaceably to assemble, and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances."

This was the language of the constitution upon which such reliance had been placed to justify and make compulsory the reception of the petition. Sir, said he, though the right to apply or petition by this article was clear, he saw not the least in it that imposed it on this House as a duty to receive; and the House being under no compulsion to receive it, it was left discretionary with them to receive or not to receive; then, sir, to justify the reception must depend on the character of the petition and petitioners; and he was sorry to say that this brought him, from a sense of duty which he owed the people whose representative he was, to comment on and investigate both the character of the petition and petitioners.

What was the character of this petition? From the remarks of the very honorable and distinguished gentleman who had introduced it, [Mr. ADAMS,] it was to abolish slavery in the District of Columbia. Was it from the citizens of the District of Columbia? No; but from the good, perhaps he ought to say better, citizens of Massachusetts, three or four hundred miles distant from those of this District. Certainly they were, by far, more wise than the citizens of the District, as they could reside at such a distance from them, and tell so much better what was to be the interest and welfare of the citizens of the District. He was sure that the citizens of the District felt, or ought to feel, extremely obliged to the good men, boys, women, and children, of Massachusetts, for their liberality and patriotism, and general supervision of the welfare of themselves and their District. Such he understood to be the character of the petition. It was similar to hundreds that had been offered at the last session, which, without reception or reading, were referred, where they had been no more heard of. Now, sir, (said he,) what was the character of the petitioners, and who are they that presume to dictate and instruct this body how to act towards the people of this District? He was sorry to say, from the best evidence that he could obtain, they were a set of low, ignorant fanatics, united with some boys; and, he was sorry to say, with women. Yes, sir, the women of Massachusetts had become legislators, and were urging their imbecile, timid men to action. The honorable gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ADAMS] had said that there were one hundred and fifty female signatures on one list, and God knew how many there were on the others.

Mr. B. said he thought it a portentous foreboding, an awful omen, when women were stepping into the political theatre, and calling on men to act, and recommending what subjects they should legislate on. He felt no disposition to go further into the investigation of the character of these women; it was enough for him to know that they were females; he felt a disposition towards them of the kindest nature, and was ready to say, "Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do."

The boys that had petitioned, he understood, mostly belonged to their Sunday schools, and were almost entirely under the influence of their teachers. The men were generally ignorant, superstitious fanatics, possessing neither religion nor character; few of whom hardly ever saw the constitution of the United States, and knew still less of the nature of our federal compact. They had no interest in the District of Columbia, and he presumed little elsewhere—all headed, though, and led on by artful, designing priests, who, he had not the least doubt, from what he could learn of the most liberal and intelligent amongst them, were at the bottom of the whole of this agitation and excitement.

It was principally the priests in New England and elsewhere that were stirring up this agitating and exciting subject. He hazarded nothing in saying, when the subject was probed to its bottom, that that class of men would be found the instigators of this whole system of confusion and iniquity. It was your priests that were seizing upon the superstition and prejudices of your ignorant men, women, and children. They were the men to be stopped and rebuked, before this excitement could be arrested. They were the men behind the curtain, who worked the wires of abolition excitement. Abolition was priestcraft, concocted and brought into existence by their unholy alliance with the superstitious and ignorant of both sexes. These creatures were as ignorant of the nature of our institutions as they are of our local situations and condition. It is to the influence of these gentry that this House is indebted, more than to any other, for the excitement, disorder, and confusion that is witnessed on the annual presentation of these harassing petitions.

Such, sir, is a brief review of the character of this petition and these petitioners, who claim, as a right, to have their petitions received by this House. He could not conceive a more degrading condition than this House would be placed in, by consuming its time, at an enormous expense to the Treasury, in receiving and listening to the petitions and memorials of old grannies and a parcel of boarding-school misses, in matters of state and legislation. What light could they throw on a subject? When grannies and misses become legislators, he thought it time for the men of New England to fold up their arms and to go home. The Congress of the United States was no place for them. Sir, what do they know about the nature and condition of slavery in the South? How many of them have witnessed it? Not one in a thousand, nor one in fifty, of those meekly priests and their subalterns, whose unholy biddings they do here. These unfortunate creatures deserve the pity more than the contempt of the South; but their instigators we well understand, and know both how to appreciate them and how to treat them, whenever they shall come amongst us. The South has not been deaf to, nor ignorant of, their designs in relation to this matter; their instrumentality has long been distinctly understood by the Southern politicians, and well marked out.

But, sir, if I were disposed to quibble on this subject, I would, from the first article of the amendments to the constitution, say that the petitioners have neither the right to petition, nor the House the right to receive such petitions. What says that article? "Congress shall make no law respecting the establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech or of the press; or the right of the people peaceably to assemble and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances." Now, sir, do these petitioners come within the character of those alluded to by the constitution? What says the latter clause? "And to petition the Government for a redress of grievances." Will you, sir, mark the object of the petitions alluded to by the constitution? The right to petition the Government for a redress of grievances. I would ask, (said he,) in what are these petitioners aggrieved by the existence of slavery in this District? They reside, as I have before said, in Massachusetts, without one particle of interest either in this District or in any one Southern or slaveholding State. In what, then, can be their grievance, to justify their petitions? They certainly are not such, then, as the constitution alluded to in its first amendment, and their interference can only be viewed as officious, pragmatic, and presumptuous; and, in his judgment, did not come strictly within the description of persons alluded to by the article of the constitution that had been relied on so much to justify their conduct, and which he had just quoted. He saw, then, no obligations imposed on the House by the constitution, even to recognise the right to petition, under such circumstances, and where there was neither grievance complained of nor interest at stake by the petitioners.

The honorable gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. ADAMS,] for whom, as a man, he confessed he had the highest respect, had worked himself unnecessarily, he thought, into a passion, as though some great and invaluable right was about to be taken from his constituents, and immense injury was to result from the refusal on the part of the House to receive those petitions. But the gentleman did not tell us in what that injury consisted. Though the gentleman and his constituents might think it an injury to them not to be permitted to interfere with other people's business, other people's morals, and other people's religion, he presumed that the free and intelligent people of this nation thought otherwise; nor would they consider that honorable gentleman, or his constituents, deprived of any rights, nor inflicted with any injury, by their being refused permission to do so.

Mr. Speaker, (continued, Mr. B.,) some honorable gentlemen have said that we ought to receive the petitions, and reject them forthwith. Now, sir, he did not see clearly the force of that reason. If the petitions, upon the first blush, were conceived to be unworthy of consideration, why receive them at all, to create a disturbance, and to consume most unnecessarily the time of this House, and then reject them? He did not see the force of such a position. The petition was pregnant with the most alarming consequences, and its consideration or agitation here, it was admitted, he believed, by all parties, could end in nothing but evil and most detrimental consequences to the integrity of this Union.

The honorable gentleman over the way [Mr. ADAMS] had said that courtesy should induce us to receive those petitions and treat them respectfully. Under ordinary cases, he did not deny but that courtesy should be extended to the applications of all persons applying here for a remedy or for a redress of grievance, but he did not think that reason held good in the present case. Where the Congress of the United States and its known wishes, or at least a large majority of them, were disrespected, and a number of persons continued to harass it, (as in the present case,) from a spirit of obduracy and pertinacity, as evidently it appeared to him to be in this case, he could not conceive that they were entitled to the least particle of courtesy from that House. On the contrary, he thought it the duty of the House, particularly that part of the body that composed the last Congress, from self-respect, to treat without the least courtesy these petitions that were now proposed for the consideration of the House. What was the character of the petitions? They were identically, in substance, the same that had been presented again and again at the last session of Congress, and had been consigned to a silent reference, without even the form of a reading or a hearing, where they yet sleep the sleep of death. Did the petitioners think that there had been any alteration in the minds of members here in their favor? They certainly must, or their conduct could be considered in no other light than insulting and audacious.

They certainly ought to know, from what had passed at the last session of Congress, that such petitions had been unfavorably received by this body, as well as by the Senate; then why were they continued, except from a spirit of obduracy and insolence? Such was the character of the petitions, and such were the facts under which they were presented. From this view of the whole circumstances, he did not see how the courtesy of the House would be at all compromised by the rejection of the petitions. In fact, he thought the dignity and independence of the House much more compromised by the reception than by the rejection of the petitions, whose sole object, he seriously believed, was to agitate and harass the country, without the remotest prospect of producing a single practicable good. He did not consider himself at liberty, from considerations of courtesy, at any time to inflict a wound on the harmony and peace of this country. He therefore conceived that the House was under no obligations, whether courteous or discourteous, to receive any petitions or memorials so offensively obnoxious, as, upon its first appearance, it must be obvious to all who had in contemplation the most extensive mischiefs to the public weal.

The honorable gentleman on his left [Mr. REED] had contended very strenuously for the right of petition, as guaranteed by the constitution of the United States. No man had a greater regard for every article of that sacred instrument (said Mr. B.) than he had. It was his textbook on all constructions of political power; but, with due respect to the opinions of that honorable gentleman to the contrary notwithstanding, he must say that the constitution had in view as well the rights, privileges, and protection of the people's representatives, and consequently of this body, as the people themselves, from which a reciprocal benefit was enjoyed by both; and the protection of each he thought equally necessary to the preservation of liberty and a proper and free administration of this Government.

Honorable gentlemen had contended that the right of petition was sacred, and should not be curtailed or abridged. He would be the last man, in that House or out of it, to attempt either; but after petitioning, there the right stopped, and those of Congress commenced; and it was equally essential to preserve the latter as the former; and the constitution and its illustrious framers had it equally as much in view. The right of reception was not, nor could it be made, a necessary consequence of the right of petition. They were separate and distinct objects in the contemplation of the constitution, and are necessarily made so for the protection of each. It had been justly and appropriately said that where the right of Congress to consider began, there the right of petitioners was at an end. If the House had a right to consider the propriety of reception, it necessarily included the right to refuse or reject the reception of that or any other petition, and, without maintaining that right in the Congress, the whole body would be subject to continual insult and degradation, which would prove, sooner or later, subversive of our whole republican institutions. When that body became so that it could not protect itself from degradation and insult, it would be time for a dissolution of our political elements, and the reorganization of one competent to the performance of the functions of a better Government.

Mr. B. said he would now say one word as to the effects and detrimental character of those petitions. Besides the effects of agitation, which had been seized on with so much avidity by a certain set of politicians, to get up an excitement for political purposes, it had produced the most deleterious consequences to those very persons whose condition they proposed to alleviate. What Southern man did not know, since the agitation of this subject by those wretchedly ignorant fanatics, that the condition of every slave to the South had been made infinitely worse. He believed there was scarcely a single State in which there existed slavery, which State had not, since the stirring of this question by the abolitionists, increased, by legislative enactments, the severity of their police laws in relation to their slaves.

He knew, of his own knowledge, that the liberties and privileges heretofore exercised and enjoyed by the slaves in the State which he had the honor, in part, to represent, had been more abridged and curtailed since the abolitionists had taken this subject in hand than they ever had been before, since his earliest recollection; and, from what he had learned from gentlemen from the other slaveholding States, and his own personal observation on that subject, it was a fact almost universal in each and every one; and this was what was called philanthropy, by those poor, ignorant, deluded creatures! Thus they were binding and riveting the shackles, through their ignorance, on the very creatures whom they profess a wish to relieve. Sir, (said Mr. B.), the abolitionists know nothing of the subject about which they would have us to legislate. They know nothing of the feelings of the people of the South on this subject, and they know less of the situation and condition of those about whom they have become so pragmatic, and over whose oppressed condition they would shed so many tears. They are yet to learn that they themselves are the worst enemies that a Southern slave has at this time on the earth; they are yet to learn that every effort of their officious and insulting intermeddling with the property of the South contributes to make the South make that property more secure, at the expense of the personal privileges of the slaves, which we inherited from our ancestors as property under the constitution of our country, the right to which no Southern man or slaveholder would condescend to dispute here.

Mr. B. said the South was easily excited on this subject, from two reasons: the first was, that they looked upon this officious interference with their property as a national insult, and a personal reflection on every slaveholder. They did not apprehend that these insolent, intermeddling fanatics could inflict on them the least injury whatever. They dared them to show their faces among them. They were prepared, and well knew how to receive them whenever they approached. Should those ladies, however, who had made themselves conspicuous in their petitions, pay a visit to the South, he was not prepared to say in what manner they would be received; if they were under arms, led on by their holy priesthood, whose handiwork was so plainly to be seen in every part of the whole transaction of their deluded followers, he was fearful that their reception might not be so very acceptable; but, under any other circumstances, he would vouch that, against the gallantry and chivalry of the South, they would enter no complaint. He most fervently prayed that, if the time ever did arrive when the people of the North should become so priestridden as to engage in this unholy enterprise, those reverend gentlemen might be the first that were sent on this holy crusade, and placed in the front of the battle. He believed upon their heads rested all the consequences that might grow out of the conduct of the abolitionists, and that their unholy garments would be stained with every drop of blood that would be spilt in this despicable contest, whether by civil war or from servile insurrection.

Abolition of Slavery.

[II. OF R.]

He was not apprehensive that that class of politicians would ever be able to inflict any real or extensive injury on the people of the South; no, the people of that section of country defied all the efforts of all the abolitionists in the world; they were fully prepared for them now, and were daily becoming more so. They understood, full well, the unholy ambition of the priesthood who had kindled up this flame to the East and North, and who were now engaged in taking the advantage of the ignorant women and boys throughout the country. Look at the petitions; what one was not headed by a priest of some denomination or other, and filled up in part of women and children, adults and boys? A strict police was only necessary to proclaim their approach, and the measure of their iniquity was immediately meted out to them.

But there was another reason, an apprehension, a serious, solemn apprehension, a dread of holy horror felt by every intelligent statesman, whose heart had ever throbbled with a patriotic emotion, for the bonds that bind together this sacred Union.

Let the first step be taken here, let the first blow be struck, the first enactment made here, on that subject, revenge and dissolution of these States would be the war-cry from the Susquehanna to the Sabine, from the Balize to Mason and Dixon's line. No, sir, you cannot act upon this subject here. Whenever it was settled, he had, on another occasion, declared that it would not be within these walls, nor upon paper, nor parchment, nor by pact, nor compacts. The very first attempt to legislate on it would sever this Union into fragments; and it was ignorance, idle, worse than stupidity itself, for gentlemen to shut their eyes, and affect blindness to the consequences that must necessarily ensue from such an attempt; and he had little sagacity, indeed, who did not foresee in this act the inevitable downfall and prostration of our whole political fabric. Yes, sir, in the dissolution of this Union would end the fairest republic that the world had ever beheld, and its downfall be hailed with transport and joy by the kingdoms and pope-doms of the earth. Can we, then, sit silent and see the germs of our dissolution planting, and sprouting, and menacing the entire overthrow of our national existence? Sir, (said he,) no voice should be silent on such an occasion. The people should be aroused from one end of the nation to the other, and the dangers that imperilled them proclaimed in a loud voice.

These clerical mischief-makers, these sacerdotal panders, should be well watched. It was a covert movement, in his opinion, with them to insinuate the influence of their church in State, and to enslave mankind, like their predecessors, who had flooded all Europe and Asia for three centuries with Christian blood, and consigned to the fagot and the flames three hundred thousand souls, victims of that heartless, merciless tribunal, the inquisition. An ambitious clergy, in all ages, had proven the greatest curses to national quietude and happiness of mankind, and had been productive of more calamities to the human race than any one other cause yet known to the history of the world. Like the element of fire, the clergy, in their proper and appropriate sphere, might prove a blessing to mankind; but when they left that sphere, all history had proved that their influence was more destructive than the consuming flame. Their march over the human mind was clandestine, and their influence furtive; their most effectual enemy had ever been an exposition of their designs, when their feebleness became as apparent as their motives were execrable. When the world once saw their designs in their true characters, they had never failed to become, not only objects of contempt, but of disgust and detestation. They should be the last on earth to tamper with the rights of an intelligent people.

The slaveholding States would regard the first attempt to legislate on that subject, in the District of Columbia, as an "entering wedge" to further legislation for other Territories and States of this Union; and he would warn gentlemen to pause before they took the first step in a matter more momentous in national importance, by far, than the Revolution by which this nation gained its independence, and established on the ruins of arbitrary power the freest republic for the protection and preservation of constitutional liberty that is recorded on the pages of modern or ancient history. Let gentlemen pause, then, he repeated, before they gave the least countenance or toleration to a practice, or measures, fraught with a train of evils and calamities that unborn generations might yet live to deplore. As wisdom proclaimed that the first spark that fell that threatened a conflagration should be immediately extinguished, so true policy proclaimed that the first step about to be taken that threatened the very existence of our Federal Government, and to produce consequent evils that no human tongue could foretell, should be opposed and thwarted upon its very threshold. For one, he had ever been disposed to show them not the least countenance, here or elsewhere; and, so help him God, he never would, so long as he entertained the least regard for this Union and the preservation of our present form of government, which that subject threatened with such immediate and imminent danger.

Mr. B. said the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. Adams,] he thought in the sincerity of his heart, as he had before intimated, was doing his constituents, and the Northern and Eastern people generally, the greatest injury, as well as injustice. If (said he) this course of things is persisted in, whether for political effect here or elsewhere, it will be impossible, in future, such will be the prejudices it will excite at the South, for any gentleman, merchant or otherwise, from the North or East, to reside in any one of the Southern States, or even to travel through any one of these States, many of which have hitherto been to them the mere abodes of hospitality and kindness, without being suspected as a spy or servile agitator, and put to the greatest inconveniences. Such would be the effect of this very misguided course pursued by his own countrymen. Sir, this is a practical view of the subject that I take, and in which I believe that the continued agitation of this subject by the abolitionists must eventually and inevitably result, and which at no distant day would amount to an entire non-intercourse between these two communities. He would here ask if that enterprising people were prepared to do any thing that would so much contribute to oppose their interest as private citizens, and to destroy their greatest prosperity? If they were a prudent, thinking people, they could not be blinded longer by a designing priesthood, or ambitious, jealous politicians. The project, therefore, of these deluded, ignorant fanatics would clearly be more injurious to their own neighbors than to those whom they sought to affect, but who were far, as private persons, placed beyond their baneful influence; and, as such, it was out of their power to affect their private property or their personal safety. It was only in a national point of view that they could affect the South, and that by destroying this Union, which composed this great and benign Government under which we lived; by effecting which they themselves were obliged to be the greatest losers. Let any statesman examine the subject, and that fact would be demonstrated beyond controversy. Why, then, should that deluded and miserable set of agitators receive the countenance of the North and East, more than from the South, while their efforts were so well calculated to cripple their best interests and check their growing prosperity.

It is impossible that that sagacious people, heretofore so much famed for their foresight and intelligence, should now become so steeped in priestcraft, superstition, and prejudice, as not to be longer able to see their glaring impolicy, and the total subversion of their best interest, by their perseverance in the wild, impracticable, and visionary course pursued by their priesthood, in their abolition efforts. Truly degenerate must the sons of those revolutionary fathers of New England be, who contributed so much in effecting the glorious independence of this great republican empire. And is it possible that these hardy sons of the North and East should be so delinquent in duty as to require now to be spurred on by the petitions of adults, women, and school children? Sir, the whole subject is farcical, originated by the priesthood, to acquire distinction and political notoriety; such a one as should meet the contempt and ridicule of the sturdy sons of democracy of the East, North, and South, and such as should be indulged only in the dreams of old maids, grannies, and children. There is not an idea connected with any part of the subject that deserves the name of manliness, and becoming the consideration of an intelligent statesman.

Are these people yet to learn to weigh the consequence of a severance of this Union, and particularly when fanaticism and anti-slavery become the avowed cause? Have they yet to count the cost and anticipate the loss of this mad project? Are they still ignorant that a non-intercourse law would be the immediate consequence of a separation of the two sections of this country? Are they not aware that commercial regulations would be immediately entered into by the South, with the European Powers, on more advantageous terms than it is now had with them? Would not Great Britain jump at such a proposition; and embrace with avidity the manifold advantages that she would realize from the acquisition of such measures? Then, sir, what would become of your manufactures to the North and East? From what country would you get your raw materials, particularly cotton? Where would you find a market for your fabricated materials? Your coarse cottons and woollens, that are now consumed almost exclusively by the slaves of the South? Surely Northern politicians must have taken but a bird's-eye view of this subject, who can even connive at such a course of suicidal policy. There would necessarily be a perfect stagnation in every branch of your manufactures, and scenes of distress and confusion, want and penury, would follow in thick succession, hitherto unknown to any part of the population of this country.

But, sir, (said he,) these are not all of the calamities that such a policy would inflict on those unfortunate people. In whose hands, he would ask, was now placed nineteen twentieths of the shipping of this country? Certainly in those of the good people of the North and East. What, sir, would become of them and their commerce at such a time? Where would you find employment for your sailors and seamen, excluded from the Southern ports and Southern trade? Your shipping would be left to rot in your own ports and harbors, and your seamen to prow through your cities, in beggary and want. Such, Mr. Speaker, would be the inevitable effects, in my humble judgment, of a non-intercourse law, passed by the Southern States, on the interest of the North and East; and to such it must come at last, if the North and East are so blended with superstition and fanaticism as to give countenance to the Quixotic projects of the abolitionists.

It is in vain for them to flatter themselves that the Southern people would prefer the continuance of this Union to a surrender of their right to their property, under any conditions or circumstances that might be proposed by foreign interference or fanatical agitation. No, there was not a member in that House from the South that would pause a moment in preferring the inviolable retention of his right to his property to a continuance of this Union; and should that question ever be made, which was now threatened by the character of the petition on your table, gentlemen deceived themselves egregiously, if they expected to hear one dissenting voice in any Southern or slaveholding State of this Union. He could assure the House, however much they might be divided in relation to men and abstract political principles, that on that subject at least there was but one sentiment prevalent throughout every slaveholding State of this Union, so far as his information extended. In fact, a man who paused in a decision on that subject, to the South would be deemed and treated as a traitor. He implored honorable gentlemen from all sections of the Union, if they had any lurking doubts or suspicions on that subject, forthwith to discard them. The whole scheme was impracticable, short of the bloodiest civil and religious war that had ever been witnessed or recorded in the history of man; and before it could be effected, the fairest portion of this favored land of republican freemen would be truly converted into "a howling wilderness." And were consequences like these to present no barrier to the wild enthusiasm of a fiend-like fanaticism? He called upon gentlemen upon all sides of the House to pause well before they took the first step to give countenance to the insanity of these fanatical madmen.

Mr. B. said, so far as he was interested, it would not make the least difference to him, as a private man, to live in a separated or a united Government; but as a public man and an American statesman, he felt the deepest interest for the perpetuity of the Union, and the sacred fraternity of the States; and it was that to which we must all come at last if this question ever gained ascendancy in the Congress of the United States. The South would be compelled to decide whether they would give up their own property or the Union. Was there a single man in the nation so ignorant as not to know what would be their unanimous decision on that subject? Sir, said he, I repeat it, without fear of contradiction, that there is not a man to the South of the Potomac that would not be looked on as a traitor, that would hesitate in deciding against the continuance of this Union under such degrading circumstances. Such a one could not live amongst us, and it is for the Eastern and Northern abolitionists to press us to make this most sad decision. What, then, will be their condition? Will they have liberated one slave more? Will it not be placed further out of their power ever to do this? Will they not have to decide, too, on this great alternative? Will they not have to decide whether they will remain members of this Union with the slaveholding States, or to separate from them in consequence of their continuing to hold their slaves? Sir, let them look to their commerce—their manufactories. Let them look to a non-intercourse with the Southern States; and what will become of these great sources of wealth, enterprise, and even sustenance, to a great part of their population?

To a New England man human nature cannot conceive a project more suicidal and self-immolating than that now agitated by the religious fanatics and priesthood of the Eastern and Northern States. But such a policy could only be expected, when politicians were prompted to action by the exhortations of women and children. It is not in the field, nor is it in the cabinet, where the counsel of lovely woman has been found most potent; to adorn her sex, she is destined for a different sphere; and it is for the want of men,

*"That women become most mannish grown,
And assume the part that men should act alone."*

He would tell the abolitionists, not a single object that they contended for could they accomplish, short of a civil war, and one, too, that would drench the fairest fields of this great republic with brothers' blood; and that they are stupid, silly, idle, creatures who dream of the contrary. Where, then, will be found their women and children, who crowd this House with silly petitions? Where their priests? In the tented field? No, sir, but skulking, shivering, shrinking from danger and responsibility, and even then denying the part that they had once taken in getting up this tragic drama. Will their women then be seen in the field, amid the clangor of arms and the shouts of victory, or heard in the cabinet with the cries of their children around them? Let the hardy sons of New England, who have had little or nothing to do with getting up this excitement, but on whom alone the brunt of war would rest, if acted out, answer this!

They have never heretofore required the cries of their children and the exhortations of their women to urge them on in the defence of their rights. He looked on the whole of the present attempt of the priesthood and abolitionists as a libel on their character; and he believed, as he had every reason to hope, that it would be ultimately proven so. No; they knew too well that their rights had not been invaded by their brethren to the South—not even threatened by them; and he would not for a moment believe that that intelligent people would ever plunge this country into all the horrors of civil war, to gratify the base, cunning, and ambitious designs of an unprincipled, ignorant priesthood, who dared to speak alone through their women and children, and thus to instigate to false action men whom they would not meet face to face, and measure reason against reason on the impolicy and evil consequences of their acts.

But (said Mr. B.) this is no new mode with the priests to insinuate the influence of church in state. It has been by the acquisition of such influence over the "weaker vessel," the imbecile and ignorant of all ages, that they have succeeded in enslaving mankind, which nothing but the light of reason, the progress of science, and the rapid march of universal intelligence, have contributed so much to dispel.

If there be any that yet doubt of the baneful effects of this unwarrantable interference of the church in the affairs of state, let him cast his eyes over the history of the middle ages; let him view through that mirror through which is reflected a scene of blood and carnage that deluged the barrens of both Europe and Asia for four centuries with blood, and have in vain challenged the history of the world for a parallel, and let him answer, when have similar causes failed to produce like effects?

Mr. Speaker, (said he,) I am no alarmist. I would to God I could allay this spirit of fanaticism and folly, and that every man, woman, and child, in this land, could view it in all its native deformities. It poisons every fountain of social intercourse, and breathes over the whole circle of its malign influence a blighting and withering exhalation, before whose pestiferous blast all nature seems to sicken and decay.

But, sir, perhaps I have dwelt long enough on this part of this disturbing subject. At least I have my own conviction of the indelicacy if not the more unenviable situation that honorable gentlemen assume here, who persist in presenting these petitions, and urging their consideration on this House—a situation that no honorable member could be desirous to covet, however fond he might be of notoriety. He had always regretted exceedingly, whenever he had seen an honorable member of that House rise and announce his intention to present a petition of that character. He thought it much more fitting and patriotic in honorable members to put all such in their pockets, or return them to their deluded, short-sighted authors; or, perhaps, to those wily priests who had been more instrumental in getting them up. Yes, sir, better, far better, would the venerable and honorable gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ADAMS] serve the cause of liberty, religion, and the peace and permanence of this Government, were he to return them to his constituents, whether men, or women, or children, and warn them of the perils and dangers that they provoked by their follies. Let him go and convince them of the impracticability of their Utopian, visionary crusade against the rights of Southern men, who would sooner see their fields and their forests deluged with blood than yield to such a foe one particle of that sacred right that they had inherited from their fathers under their constitution, and held without molestation for the better half of a century. Let him teach these constituents (for uninformed they must be) how revolting it is to the feelings of honorable men to have impudent strangers, totally ignorant of their situations or conditions, to intrude on their deliberation, and undertake to dictate to them in what manner they should treat a subject, or dispose of it, in which they have not a single interest, and of which, from the very nature of things, they cannot have any thing like correct information. Let him, sir, return with his idle, self-immolating petitions, and endeavor to dispel from the eyes of those weak, deluded petitioners the trance that has been so ingeniously imposed on them by an ambitious, cunning, designing, but dastardly priesthood, whose predecessors have done so much mischief to mankind through all ages, without hazarding the first hem of their garments in battle. Let him show what all history has proven to be the consequences of a religious war, and that such must be, if persisted in by them, (and they can stir up enough to effect it,) the unquestionably inevitable result in the present case.

Let no man deceive himself in the nature of this extraordinary project of fanaticism. There may yet grow out of its scenes that which, in enormity, will by far outstrip those enacted by the Christian and Turk in the twelfth, thirteenth, and fourteenth centuries; and with what final benefit to the Christian world, let history speak. Yes, sir, proceed with your fanatic designs, and you may light up a blaze of even a religious war, that may end in the extermination of one portion or the other of our fairest countrymen. Will the Christians of the South, whose religion it is to hold slaves, yield in their love for their religion and piety to those of the North, who have thus undertaken to pass sentence of condemnation on them? No. You will find some of our oldest and ablest men of the church, who have grown gray under their present institutions, where slavery is tolerated, taking the field in resistance to the usurpation and insolence of their foreign invaders, in defence of their religion, their rights, and their property. The church, too, may not escape the shock that some of their designing priests may have intended alone for state, by which the foundation of their presbyteries and episcopacies may be shaken to their centres; and it may shortly become necessary for the South to prescribe the limits to these ministerial incendiaries and their unholy abettors. To such a state of frenzy have they already excited the indignant feelings of the people of the South, that suspicion amounts to the conviction of any suspected of being an incendiary. The forms of a trial have been dispensed with, and will be, under this state of excitement; and the accused, though innocent, by the madness and folly of abolitionism, may be, in the hurry of the excitement that they have created, dragged to an ignominious punishment.

I will again repeat, (continued Mr. B.,) that those ignorant creatures knew not what they had been doing; some of them were not even acquainted with the extent of the mischief that they had been induced by others to set on foot; in fact, none were more ignorant than themselves of the true nature of the subject, that they had presumed to dictate to this House in what manner they should act. He hesitated not to say, when this subject approached to extremes, that its mischiefs would recoil on the heads of its authors, though, perhaps, at the expense of the happiness and lives of thousands and tens of thousands of better souls.*

Before Mr. BARNUM had concluded his speech, (as given entire in preceding pages,) he gave way to Mr. TAYLOR, on whose motion the House adjourned.

TUESDAY, JANUARY 10.

On motion of Mr. ADAMS, several amendments were made to the journal of yesterday, the purport of which was to give a more definite description of the sundry petitions presented by him in relation to the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia.

ABOLITION OF SLAVERY.

Mr. DAVIS moved a suspension of the rule, to enable him to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That all petitions, memorials, resolutions, propositions, or papers, relating in any way, or to any extent whatever, to the subject of slavery, or to the abolition of slavery, shall, without being either printed or referred, be laid on the table, and that no further action whatever shall be had thereon.

Mr. D. called for the yeas and nays on the motion to suspend; which were ordered, and, being taken, were: Yeas 102, nays 78—not two-thirds.

So the House refused to suspend the rule.

FREEDOM OF ELECTION.

Several reports having been made from the standing committees, and before the reports of committees were concluded—

Mr. BELL rose and said that he did not wish to interfere with the regular reports of committees, but that he would now move for leave to bring in the bill, of which he had given notice; the other day, to secure the freedom of election.

* In justice to the ministers of the Baptist and Methodist churches, from the best information had on the subject, they have had but little, if any thing, to do with getting up this fanatical excitement; and, in the South, it is believed that they are unanimously opposed to every step that the fanatics have taken in relation to abolition.—Note by Mr. B.

The SPEAKER said the motion was not now in order; but that it would be in order for the gentleman from Tennessee to submit the motion at any time when, under the rule regulating the "order of business of the day," it would be in order for him to submit a motion on any other subject.

Mr. BELL said he was under the necessity of making a question on this point. He had given notice of this motion the other day, because he could procure an opportunity to bring in a resolution which might accomplish the object. He thought that he was entitled to make the motion at this time. He did not propose now to offer a resolution, but a substitute for a report; and if the Chair was not satisfied that he had a right so to do at the present time, he must beg leave to submit a few remarks.

The SPEAKER said he had looked carefully into the question, and it was his decision that the motion was not in order at this time.

Mr. BELL appealed from this decision, and entered, at some length, into his reasons for so doing. The rule under which he had given notice of this motion was the 87th rule, which is in the following terms:

"Every bill shall be introduced by motion for leave, or by an order of the House, on the report of a committee; and, in either case, a committee to prepare the same shall be appointed. In cases of a general nature, one day's notice, at least, shall be given of the motion to bring in a bill; and every such motion may be committed."

There were two modes, Mr. B. said, under this rule, of getting a bill before the House, and, in either case, it must be done by the order of the House; and even bills reported in the morning were received under the order of the House. The same law, the same reason, and the same rule, almost literally governed both cases. Both bills were embraced under the same rule, and the coherence was the same. Upon what principle was it that the Chair had decided that a motion for leave to bring in a bill should not be assigned the same hour as other reports? By what means could a distinction be made in the two cases? The decision not only postponed the time for a day, but might postpone it to the end of the session. He appealed to the magnanimity and sense of justice of the House; and, if that was not sufficient, he appealed to the right of deliberation in this House. He hoped that his character there was too well known to admit of the supposition that he would bring forward a frivolous measure, or one the object of which was only to give him an opportunity of making a harangue for ephemeral effect here or elsewhere.

The SPEAKER stated the grounds of his decision to the House. He premised by saying that this was a novel proceeding in this House. From the organization of the Government (1789) to the present period, as far as precedents had been searched, but few cases were to be found (he believed but two or three) of bills brought in on motion for leave; and these, so far as any thing appears, had been brought in by general consent, and referred, sub silentio, to a committee of the House. The Chair had looked in vain for precedents, in the former proceedings of the House, to aid him in the course proper to be taken on this occasion. He had found none, and had been thrown back to the question of the construction which it was proper should be placed on these rules. In fixing this construction, he had adopted the principle familiar in legal proceedings, that that construction was to be placed upon the statute which would give effect to every part of it, provided it be susceptible of such construction, and not to place such a construction upon one part as would totally abrogate and annul another, and render it inoperative.

This is a "motion" for "leave to bring in a bill." It is made under the rule which provides that "every bill shall be introduced by motion for leave, or by an order of the House on the report of a committee; and, in either case, a committee to prepare the bill shall be appointed. In cases of a general nature, one day's notice at least shall be given of the motion to bring in a bill, and every such motion may be committed." At what time, and at what stage of the daily proceedings of the House, is it in order to make this motion? The rules prescribe a particular "order of business of the day," for every day. The Speaker is first to "cause the journal of the preceding day to be read," and no other motion or business can be interposed until this is done. "As soon as the journal is read," "reports first from the standing and then from the select committees shall be called for and disposed of; resolutions shall then be called for, and disposed of by the same rules which apply to petitions." "And, after one hour shall have been devoted to reports from committees and resolutions, it shall be in order to proceed to the orders of the day." It is further provided that "the business specified in the two preceding rules [the reading of the journal, reports from committees, and resolutions or motions] shall be done at no other part of the day," except during the morning hour. Upon the meeting of the House this morning, the journal of "the preceding day was read," as required by the rules; "reports from standing committees were then called for," as required by the rules. A part of these reports have been made, and a part remain to be made. At this stage of the proceedings a member arises, and proposes to interrupt and arrest the call for reports from committees, by offering to submit "a motion" for "leave to bring in a bill." Can this motion be entertained at this time? In the opinion of the Chair it cannot, without a palpable violation of the rule quoted. If it can be entertained at this stage, upon the same principle it could have been entertained immediately upon the meeting of the House this morning, and before the "journal of the preceding day was read."

The rules prescribe a particular order in which the business of the House shall be transacted. They provide a division or allotment of time, and set apart an hour on each day within which a particular class or description of "business shall be done," and expressly declare that this class or description of business "shall be done at no other part of the day." The order of business thus prescribed is, 1st, that the "journal of the preceding day shall be read;" 2d, reports from committees; and, 3d, resolutions and motions shall be called for and disposed of according to a prescribed order; and after the expiration of one hour, devoted to business of this character, it shall be in order to proceed to the orders of the day. These are the express requisitions of these rules. It may be asked, at what time can this "motion for leave to bring in a bill," be made? The answer is furnished by the rule itself. After reports from committees are made and disposed of, "resolutions shall then be called for" from the several States, in the order of the States, as prescribed in the rule. The member must wait until his State shall be called, and it shall be in order for him to move a resolution, or make a motion, and then it will be regular to entertain this motion. This is the only proper time to make the motion, unless, by a suspension of the rules, which requires a vote of two thirds, it shall be allowed by the House at another hour of the day. But it is suggested that "resolution," the term used in the rule, is not a motion. They belong to the same class of business. A resolution is in the nature of a motion, and a motion in the nature of a resolution, and in the practice of the House they have been invariably treated and acted on as synonymous. For example, when the States are called for resolutions, it has been the constant practice to make motions to print documents, and on various other subjects. A motion is an unwritten resolution, and, when submitted, is reduced to writing and is recorded on the journal. This objection is technical, and not substantial. If it be not so, then we must come to the absurd conclusion that, by the rules, there is no time at which motions are in order. By this construction, both rules, the one giving the right to a member to "submit a motion for leave to bring in a bill," and the other prescribing the "order of business of the day" during the morning hour, have their full operation. The member has a right to make this motion, but he must wait until the time arrives when it is in order for him to do it. If a contrary construction be given; if a member has a right at any time of the day to make the motion proposed, then the rule prescribing the "order of business of the day" is practically abrogated and rescinded. If this motion may be made at a period of the day to interrupt and arrest the call for reports from committees, and the call of the States for resolutions and motions in the order of States, as prescribed by the rule, there is nothing to prevent it from being made before the journal of the preceding day has been read; and to permit either would be totally to change and revolutionize the settled order of business of this House. What would be the consequences which would follow? The member making the motion for leave would have a right to debate it. He would have a right not only to state the character of the bill which he asks leave to bring in, but to discuss its merits. He may debate it, if he chooses, through the day. Other members may also debate it, in favor or against "the motion for leave" to bring it in; and thus the regular and established order of business under these rules would be deranged and set aside, at the will of any one member, at any period of the day, when he chooses to make a "motion for leave to bring in a bill." The daily reports made by committees would be arrested, not only for one day, but as long as the debate on the motion may continue. All resolutions and motions, pending and undetermined, as well as those to be offered, must be postponed, and precedence given to this motion. There is nothing in the rule authorizing this motion to be made which makes it a privileged motion, to take precedence over all other business; and to permit it to be made so would be not only to change the mode and order of doing business in this House, from the first Congress to the present time, but to put it in the power of individual members to obstruct, delay, and prevent action on the other business of the House.

By restricting the right to make this motion to the proper hour for submitting motions or resolutions, all confusion and derangement of the "order of the business of the House" will be avoided. The motion, when submitted in proper time, will be subject to all the rules which apply to other motions and resolutions; and thus the business of the House will go on regularly, and according to the established practice and usages of the House.

To illustrate further to what practical results a contrary decision from that which had been given would lead, the Speaker stated that it was only "in cases of a general nature" that one day's notice of this motion was required. In cases not of a general nature, no notice of the motion was required. Suppose a member has a petition and a resolution which he desires to present, with a view to have them referred to a committee of the House for a report and bill, for the relief of his constituents. By the rules, petitions can only be presented on petition day, being the first day of the meeting of the House in each week; and then only as the States are called in their order for the presentation of petitions.

H. OF R.]

Freedom of Election.

The member must wait until petition day, and until his State is called, before he can present his petition. And so of resolutions and motions: the member must wait until the resolutions pending and undetermined are disposed of, and his State is called for resolutions and motions, before he is entitled to submit a resolution or make a motion. There is no proceeding of this House better established, or more imperatively required by the rules, than this. But if the construction now insisted on be the true one, that this motion for leave may be made at this or another hour of every day, why, then, a member having a petition to present, instead of waiting for petition day to present it, has only to prepare a bill based on his petition, and come into the House on any morning, and submit his motion for leave to bring in his bill, and may proceed to the discussion of the merits of the bill which he asks leave to bring in. And so of a resolution of inquiry directed to a committee, which he may wish to offer. Instead of waiting for his State to be called in its order for resolutions, he has only to prepare a bill embracing the objects of his resolution, and come into the House at a time when under the rules he is not authorized to offer resolutions or make motions, and submit his "motion for leave to bring in his bill," and proceed to discuss it. Every member may in like manner submit motions for leave to bring in bills, and any member may submit as many motions of the kind as he pleases, or as he has applications for relief from his constituents. Every one must see that the effect of allowing such motions, except at the regular time of making motions, would be to annul and set aside the rules prescribing the "order of business of the day," and to overturn and wholly change the established and uniform practice of the House in the transaction of its business.

But it is assumed that this "motion for leave" may be made when reports of committees are called for, because it is said the same rule provides for reports of committees and for the motions for leave; and it is insisted that bills cannot be reported, even by a committee, except by "an order of the House," and "in either case a committee to prepare the same shall be appointed." It is said that in every case of a bill reported by a committee, though no motion is formally put, "an order of the House" is presumed to be made to authorize the committee to report the bill. This error arises from not adverting to the fact that by another rule of the House, subsequent in the date of its enactment, the standing committees are authorized to "report by bill or otherwise," without "an order of the House." The rule itself is the order of the House. That rule is, that "the several standing committees of the House shall have leave to report by bill or otherwise." Committees under this latter rule have a right to report bills without any other previous "order of the House." The same rule does not apply to "motions for leave to bring in a bill." The inference, therefore, that when it is in order for a committee to report a bill, it is in order for a member not acting by order of any committee to submit, not a bill, but "a motion for leave to bring in a bill," is erroneous. We must not confound "the motion for leave" with the bill which is to follow if the motion be agreed to by the House. This is a motion, not a bill. The motion is one thing, and the bill which is to follow, if the motion be agreed to, another. The member does not rise and present a bill to the House, as committees in their reports do; but he submits a motion for leave, which motion is the question before the House; and the question still recurs at what time this motion may be made. There is nothing in the rule authorizing it which gives it precedence over other motions or reports of committees, prior in point of time, and entitled to be first considered. The policy of our rules and the practice under them have always been to employ the agency of committees organized by the House to originate and bring in bills. All the bills ever brought into this House have been reported by committees of the House, with the exception of a very few cases, (he believed not exceeding two or three,) when bills had first been brought in "on motion for leave," and then referred to a committee to prepare the same. It does not appear, in these cases, but that the motion for leave was made at a time and in a stage of the proceedings of the House when the member had a right, under the rules, to make it. We cannot presume that it was made at any other time. We have committees organized, with their respective duties and jurisdiction prescribed and defined, to whom, by petition, resolution, or motion, subjects are referred. These committees have a right to report by bill, without "an order of the House," or any question taken. No individual member has this right. There is nothing which, in any view of the question, can give to this motion precedence over reports and other motions and resolutions. It is allowed, it is true, to be made, but it can only be made in proper time. It is but a motion, and not, as has been assumed, a substitute for a report. No member can constitute himself a quasi committee, and bring into the House a substitute for a report. It cannot be assigned the same hour allotted to reports, because a motion for leave to bring in a bill is not a report, and cannot take precedence over reports, or of resolutions or motions which are prior in point of time, and entitled to be first considered.

The one day's notice required to be given of this motion, "in cases of a general nature," does not authorize the motion itself to be made out of time and in violation of the prescribed order of business. The notice "in cases of a general nature" only enables the mover to make the motion at the time when motions may be made under the rules. Without the notice, "in cases of a general nature," the motion cannot be made, even when it would be otherwise in order for the member to make it. The analogy between this and another rule of this House requiring one day's notice of a motion is striking. That rule is, that "no standing rule or order of the House shall be rescinded or changed without one day's notice being given of the motion therefor." A member gives notice, under this rule, that he will on to-morrow submit a motion to rescind one of the rules of the House: is he thereby entitled on to-morrow to submit his motion, before it is in order to make a motion, and thus give precedence to it over all other resolutions and motions pending and undetermined, and by their priority in point of time entitled under the rules to be first considered? Certainly not. The practice on this point has been long settled. The motion can only be made at such time as the member making it would have the right to move a resolution, or make a motion on any other subject, according to the rules. The notice in both cases removes a disability, and confers no privilege which can give precedence to these motions over all other resolutions and motions which, under the rules, are authorized to be made. There is no analogy to be found in the proceedings of the other branch of this Legislature, where the practice has been allowed to bring in bills on motions for leave, because the rules governing the proceedings of that body differ radically from ours. There is no allotment of particular hours of time in each day in the Senate, such as our rules prescribe, within which certain specified business, of particular classes, and in a specified order of time, shall be transacted, and at "no other part of the day." The complaint upon the ground of the delay which will be produced in making this motion, by restricting it to the time when, under the rules, it shall be in order to make it, applies equally to all the other business before the House. The rules operate equally on all the members of the House, and prescribe a fixed order in which business of different classes shall be transacted. No business can regularly be done out of order. For example, reports are called from committees every morning. A report is made which gives rise to debate. It must be first disposed of before it is in order for other committees to make reports. So of resolutions or motions. After reports are made and disposed of, the States are called for resolutions or motions. A resolution is offered which gives rise to debate. It must be first disposed of before it is in order for any other member to offer a resolution. The member wishing to make a report, or offer a resolution, may with the same propriety complain, on the ground of delay, because he cannot be permitted to do so until the pending report or resolution made before him shall have been disposed of; as in this case he can complain that he cannot make this motion until other business, having precedence, has been disposed of. It is the natural and necessary operation of the rules. If a member submit a resolution or other proposition, when in order for him to do so, which gives rise to a long debate, it may be inconvenient for other members to wait until it shall be disposed of before they can bring forward propositions or motions which they desire to make, and yet every one knows that they are compelled to do so. So of other business on the calendar. A bill, for example, is taken up for consideration. A member is desirous to take up and consider another bill on the calendar, but he cannot do so until the bill before the House is disposed of; and yet the delay produced by a long debate on the bill first in order may be inconvenient, and may operate to delay and defeat action on much of the other business on the calendar of the House. There is no way to prevent this. The business first brought forward, as a general rule, is first in order, and must be first disposed of. The inconvenience of delay of important measures may, in many cases, exist, but it cannot alter or change the rules of the House, which are imperative in their terms. It was for these reasons, briefly stated, that he had felt himself constrained to make this decision. It was, he said, not the first time, during his service in that chair, that it had become his duty to decide new and complex questions of order, raised for the first time in the history of our proceedings; questions upon which, of course, there are no precedents to guide or aid us in the decision to be made. He had often heretofore felt, as he now felt, the delicacy and high responsibility of the duty which devolved upon him. But on this, as well as on all occasions, he had this consolation: that if he had fallen into error, this House had only to indicate by its vote what its judgment was; and, if differing from his own, he should always take sincere pleasure, in the future administration of the law of this House, in conforming to the judgment or decision of the House, whatever that judgment or decision may be. The decision of the Chair had been pronounced. There is an appeal, and the question on the part of the Chair is submitted to the House.

At the suggestion of Mr. MERCER, Mr. BELL withdrew his motion till all the committees should have made their reports.

At a subsequent part of the day,

Mr. BELL renewed his motion for leave to bring in a bill.

The SPEAKER said he was about to state that the hour devoted to reports had elapsed, and that it was therefore his duty to announce the orders of the day.

Mr. BELL wished to inquire whether the half hour which had been spent in taking the yeas and nays was to be considered as a component part of the hour devoted to resolutions and reports.

The SPEAKER said that the uniform course had been to commence the computation of the hour from the moment at which reports were first called for.

Mr. BELL said he then gave notice that he would to-morrow again ask leave to introduce this bill.

EXECUTIVE ADMINISTRATION.

The House then resumed the consideration of the resolution (originally offered by Mr. WISE) reported from the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, as follows:

Resolved, That so much of the President's message as relates to the 'condition of the various executive departments, the ability and integrity with which they have been conducted, the vigilant and faithful discharge of the public business in all of them, and the causes of complaint, from any quarter, at the manner in which they have fulfilled the objects of their creation,' be referred to a select committee, to consist of nine members, with power to send for persons and papers, and with instructions to inquire into the condition of the various executive departments, the ability and integrity with which they have been conducted, into the manner in which the public business has been discharged in all of them, and into all causes of complaint, from any quarter, at the manner in which said departments, or their bureaux or offices, or any of their officers or agents, of every description whatever, directly or indirectly connected with them in any manner, officially or unofficially, in duties pertaining to the public interest, have fulfilled or failed to accomplish the objects of their creation, or have violated their duties, or have injured and impaired the public service and interest; and that said committee, in its inquiries, may refer to such periods of time as to them may seem expedient and proper."

The question pending was the following amendment, submitted by Mr. PEARCE, of Rhode Island: Strike out all after the word "Resolved," and insert the following:

"That so much of the President's message as is in the following words, to wit: 'Before concluding this paper, I think it is due to the various executive departments to bear testimony to their prosperous condition, and to the ability and integrity with which they have been conducted. It has been my aim to enforce in all of them a vigilant and faithful discharge of the public business; and it is gratifying to me to believe that there is no just cause of complaint, from any quarter, at the manner in which they have fulfilled the objects of their creation'—be referred to a select committee of nine members, with instructions to inquire into any specific causes of complaint which may be alleged against the integrity of the administration of any of the departments or their bureaux, or the vigilance and fidelity with which their duties have been discharged; and that said committee have power to send for persons and papers."

Mr. HAMER was entitled to the floor, but gave way, on request, to

Mr. FRENCH, who said he wished to have read to the House a general proposition, which, he hoped, would meet the views of gentlemen on all sides. The paper in question was then read, as follows:

Resolved, That so much of the President's message as is in the following words, to wit: "Before concluding this paper, I think it due to the various executive departments to bear testimony to their prosperous condition, and to the ability and integrity with which they have been conducted. It has been my aim to enforce in all of them a vigilant and faithful discharge of the public business; and it is gratifying to me to believe that there is no just cause of complaint, from any quarter, at the manner in which they have fulfilled the objects of their creation"—be referred to five select committees, (one for each department,) to consist of seven members each, with instructions to inquire into the manner in which the duties pertaining to the several executive departments, and their respective bureaux, have been performed, under the several laws defining and regulating the same; into all frauds, corruption, and abuses, which are, or from any quarter may be, alleged to exist in said departments, or any of them, or in their, or any of their, respective bureaus, under the present administration; and if any such frauds, corruption, or abuses exist, to inquire by whom committed or practised, and the injury thereby done to the public interest; and that each of said committees have the power to send for persons and papers.

The SPEAKER said the resolution which had been read was in the nature of a motion, and, of course, was not before the House.

Mr. HAMER then rose and concluded his remarks, as given in extenso heretofore.

After Mr. HAMER concluded,

Mr. McKEON obtained the floor, but gave way to enable the House, by general consent, to take up the

MINT AND COINAGE BILL.

The amendment of the Senate to the bill supplementary to the acts regulating the mint was then read and concurred in, nem. con.

The House then adjourned.

SURPLUS REVENUE.

Mr. CAMBRELENG, from the Committee of Ways and Means, made a report, accompanied by a bill, on the subject of the surplus revenue. The title of the latter was "a bill to reduce the revenue of the United States to the wants of the Government."

Mr. OWENS remarked that as this was a very important report, as well as the accompanying bill, he would move that both be read; which was agreed to.

The bill and report were then read by the Clerk. The bill is as follows:

"A bill to reduce the revenue of the United States to the wants of the Government.

"Be it enacted, &c., That from and after the 30th day of September next, in all cases where duties are imposed on foreign imposts by the act of the 14th of July, 1832, entitled 'An act to alter and amend the several acts imposing duties on imposts,' or by any other act, shall exceed twenty per centum on the value thereof, one third part of such excess shall be deducted; from and after the 31st of March, 1838, one half of the residue of such excess shall be deducted; and on the 30th of September, 1838, the other half shall be deducted, any thing in the act of 2d of March, 1833, to the contrary notwithstanding.

"Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That from and after the 30th of September next, the duties on salt and coal shall be, and the same are hereby, repealed."

The bill having been twice read, and the reading of the report being concluded—

Mr. CAMBRELENG moved that the bill be committed to a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and that the bill and report be printed.

Mr. LAWRENCE said, as a member of the Committee of Ways and Means, and one of the minority of that committee upon this subject, he hoped he might be permitted, in the outset, to express his entire dissent from the principles laid down both in the bill and in the report.

Sir, said Mr. L., this is a measure of great importance—no less than a bill to reduce the revenues of this country, which were proposed by the law of 1832 not to be reduced till 1842; that is, in five years and a half from this time. It was, he repeated, a bill to bring down the revenues of the country, in the short period of eighteen months, as much as was proposed by the law of 1832 in five years and a half. He wished, therefore, the members of the House to reflect for a moment upon the principles contained in that report, and those contained in the bill. He put the question to the members of that House, whether there was any serious, any abiding feeling there that that bill was to become the law of the land. This question should be answered; for the bill was of so much importance that it was a necessary duty that House owed to the country that it should be advised that such legislation was contemplated upon the great interests of the country.

What was to be the effect, merely, of simply reporting this bill now? It was to create a panic from one end of the country to the other. What was its present state, from Maine to Georgia? What was the state of our finances? How did they stand with reference to pecuniary facilities? Why, that in all the great commercial cities of the East, (and he understood it to be worse and higher in the new States,) money was from fifteen to twenty or thirty per cent. per annum. Sir, said he, there is already a panic, growing out of the peculiar condition in which the finances of the country had been placed, and the effect of the proposition then before the House was to increase that panic; and how? You come down here, and propose a reduction upon all articles of import of ten per cent. in six months, ten per cent. more in six months thereafter, and ten per cent. more in the ensuing six months.

Mr. MANN, of New York, raised the point of order, whether the merits of the bill were open to debate at this incipient stage.

Mr. LAWRENCE would go through in one moment. [Cries of "Go on!" "go on!" from several parts of the House.]

Mr. MANN remarked that the debate was entirely irregular; but if the House were disposed that it should go on, it could, of course, so order.

Mr. LAWRENCE said he intended to conclude his remarks by moving to lay the bill on the table. He proceeded. He wished to appeal to a few gentlemen of that House on the subject. He appealed, then, to the Representatives from the State of Pennsylvania, for the purpose of ascertaining whether this bill be a party measure; he hoped it was not; but he appealed to the members from that State, and asked them if they were ready to sanction and adopt the doctrines of that bill and report. He appealed next to the members from the State of New York. He had been told that that State was in favor of the system, but he did not believe it. He knew there were many gentlemen from that State on that floor in favor of this system; but a majority of her people, he had no hesitation in saying, so far as he knew them, never would sustain the doctrines set forth in that report.

[Mr. MANN exclaimed, he knows very little, then, about the sentiments of that people!]

Mr. L. also appealed to the State of Ohio, and to all the great and growing States of the West, if they had no interest in this question. Was there a gentleman upon this floor, truly representing his constituents, who would get up in his place, and say he was willing to place the whole industry of his country upon the same foundation as that of foreign nations? He could anticipate their answer. It would be in the negative. He appealed next to New England, to the whole of New England; he would appeal to the State of Connecticut, whose delegation composed a portion of the administration party in that House, if they would dare go home to their constituents with this report in their hands, and say to them, "this is our doctrine; we will stand or fall by it."

Sir, they would not be sustained for an hour if they did so. When he appealed to New England, he was aware there was a diversity of opinion upon this subject; but he was confident there was no difference of opinion on one point; and that was, that this extraordinary reduction, brought forward at this time, and under the circumstances, was without the shadow of a plea for it.

What had they been told by the Secretary of the Treasury? What did the departments say? Did not they tell them that, in their opinion, the revenue would fall short during the present year? Did not the Secretary of the Treasury, after making his estimates, (and who knew better?) state that the revenue, after the appropriation made on the 31st of December next, would be short at least three millions of dollars? And what did they know about the revenue of 1838? Who could say what would be derived from the customs or from the public lands? Who could tell what contingencies might arise in that interval?

Again he denounced the bill as a monstrous measure, fraught with the most dangerous consequences, and whose effect would be to weaken, if not break down, the bonds of confidence and credit which ought mutually to subsist between men and communities. He again and again reiterated his appeal to gentlemen of the administration party from Pennsylvania, Connecticut, and New Hampshire, &c., to come out and avow if they were in favor of this bill, or that they believed it to be for the interest of the country. Mr. L. then went on to show that the principles of free trade ought not to be attempted in this country until a corresponding feeling had been exhibited by Great Britain and the continent of Europe; for they taxed foreign articles most heavily, particularly tobacco, bacon and hams, coals, &c. He was referring to the British tariff on imported articles, when

The CHAIR interposed, and said the whole merits of the bill were not open at that stage.

Mr. LAWRENCE wished to speak of the effects of sending this bill out to the people, and, after doing so, should move to lay it on the table.

The CHAIR had merely apprised the gentleman that the merits of the bill were not open on a motion to print and refer it.

Mr. LAWRENCE inquired if a motion to reject it would be in order.

The CHAIR replied, not in that stage.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Would it be in order to move its indefinite postponement?

The CHAIR. That motion would be in order; but the motion to lay on the table would take precedence.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Would that motion open the discussion?

The CHAIR replied, that a motion to postpone indefinitely opened the whole merits of a proposition.

Mr. LAWRENCE then moved the indefinite postponement of the bill.

Mr. L. proceeded. He would assure the House that he would take up very little time, but he simply wished to show the House the inevitable effect of adopting this bill. As an instance of this, he would advert to some articles of import imported into Great Britain, showing the impolicy of introducing the free-trade system into this country.

In England, ham and bacon, on importation, paid a duty of six cents a pound. Unmanufactured tobacco sixty-seven cents a pound, while manufactured tobacco paid no less than eight dollars a pound. Even coal, strange as it might seem, for it could be hardly conceived whence competition in that article could come, paid a duty of nine dollars a ton, or two pounds sterling. Tallow candles fourteen cents a pound, while spermaceti, of which large quantities were made in this country, paid no less than fifty-six cents a pound.

Mr. L. said he could go on at great length, and show that on whatever interfered with the industry of Great Britain she imposed heavy protective duties, and the continent pretty much followed her example. He would put it, therefore, to gentlemen—to practical gentlemen especially—whether, if the duties were all taken off, more would be exported than at present? It appeared to him a solecism, unless foreign countries did the same. He did not believe the exportation of a single article would be increased, unless we first made a treaty, or some regulations, in reference to the article itself. Mr. L. then appealed to the cotton growers, and went on to show that, as Great Britain was extending her importation of that article from other quarters, she would necessarily require less from the United States. The quantity, and the quality too, from other countries imported by her was increasing every year. Up to the 30th of June, last year, the quantity she imported from the East Indies was double what it was the year before. Nor was that all; she was now importing largely from Egypt, Peru, the Brazils, and other places; and the quantity and quality from those countries were immeasurably augmenting.

Mr. VANDERPOEL then rose and moved the orders of the day, remarking that it seemed as if all the business of the session had to give way to debates on propositions in their incipency.

The House refused to proceed to the orders: Ayes 58, noes 74.

Mr. McKAY said, before the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LAWRENCE] proceeded, he wished to draw the attention of the Chair to the 103d rule; and to inquire, first, if it was necessary, under his construction of that rule, to commit that bill; and, 2d, if discussion could be entertained on the day the bill was introduced. Mr. McK. then read the rule in question, which is in the following words:

"103. No motion or proposition for a tax or charge upon the people shall be discussed the day in which it is made or offered, and every such proposition shall receive its first discussion in a Committee of the Whole House."

The CHAIR said, if any of the provisions of the bill went to create a tax or charge upon the people, it must be committed.

Mr. LAWRENCE. It is quite the other way, sir, because it goes to reduce the taxes.

The CHAIR expressed some doubts, as the question was one that had not, to his recollection, ever before been decided.

Mr. MERCER remarked that the motion to postpone indefinitely rode over every other.

The CHAIR. Suppose the previous question were demanded, what would be the main question?

Mr. MERCER. The motion to postpone indefinitely.

The CHAIR. Certainly not. It would be on the engrossment of the bill. The Chair then suggested that, perhaps, the best mode of obviating any difficulty would be to proceed to the orders of the day, and suffer the subject to lie over till to-morrow, when, as a report from a committee, it would be the first business in order as soon as the journal was read.

Mr. LAWRENCE had a very few words to say, and if the House would permit him to proceed, he pledged himself not to occupy more than three minutes.

Mr. MANN, of New York, remarked that the former practice of the House, repeatedly decided, had been to commit such bills. He adverted to the great advantage the gentleman from Massachusetts had over the other members of the House, if, as was the obvious intention of the rule just referred to, one day's reflection were not allowed upon this bill before debate upon it progressed, since the gentleman was a member of the committee which reported it.

Though Mr. M. was not prepared to go into the debate, he could nevertheless make a very satisfactory answer to the question propounded to the State he had the honor, in part, to represent, by the gentleman from

Massachusetts. Mr. M. then went on to contend that no other construction could be put upon the 103d rule, than that this subject, and all subjects on their first introduction, should lie over a day for consideration. Any other interpretation put upon it, and it might as well be erased from the rules altogether. He could not help admiring the ingenuity with which the gentleman seemed to take time by the forelock, hurling his denunciations against a measure few but himself had seen, and sending out an inflammatory speech to the country, before any one else had an opportunity of replying to him. Mr. M. read the rule, (as given above,) and asked if language could be more plain or positive than that such a proposition could not be discussed on the day of its introduction. Why, the very object of that rule was—

Mr. REED here called the gentleman from New York to order, on the ground that the Chair had not as yet given its decision, and debate could only be entertained on an appeal.

The CHAIR repeated his former suggestion, as the best mode of obviating the difficulty.

Mr. LAWRENCE had no objection to give way to the orders of the day, if it should be the pleasure of the House.

Mr. CRAIG hoped the House would order the report to be printed; so that at least other members might be put in possession of the subject they were discussing.

Mr. ADAMS inquired if the House could proceed to the orders before the question on the rejection of the bill had been decided. Besides, the bill had not yet been ordered to a second reading.

The CHAIR remarked that it had.

Mr. ADAMS. It has not.

The CHAIR stated the question. A bill had been reported, and read twice. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. OWENS] called for the reading of the report; after which, a motion was made by the gentleman who introduced it, to refer it to a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union; pending which motion, the gentleman from Massachusetts moved the postponement of the bill. The Chair said that it was perfectly competent for the House to proceed to the orders of the day, and the Chair would take the sense of the House upon that motion.

Mr. BELL contended that the Chair had no right to entertain any motion so reiterated.

The CHAIR replied that it was repeatedly done. Motions were frequently made to proceed to the orders of the day; which, being unsuccessful, were afterwards repeated.

Mr. BELL. I remember no instance of the kind.

Mr. CAMBRELENG. I have done it twenty times within my immediate recollection; and I have known it done when the gentleman from Tennessee himself [Mr. BELL] filled the chair, and always entertained the motions.

The CHAIR. The House can go to the orders of the day at any time; and if the motion be unsuccessful at one time, it may be renewed at another. Such has been the known practice of the House.

Mr. BELL. I enter my protest against it now, whatever may have been the practice heretofore.

The CHAIR. The Chair decides the motion to proceed to the orders of the day to be in order.

Mr. BELL appealed from that decision, in order, he said, to make a few remarks against it. Mr. B. then went on to argue that, by the decision of the Chair, the whole business of the House might be arrested, since a few members might continually renew the motion and weary the House until it assented, or arrest any discussion then going on. It did not follow, that a certain practice, which was wrong per se, could be right because it had been occasionally indulged in, and suffered to pass sub silentio, to use the Speaker's words the other morning. Having concluded the few words he had to say, he withdrew his appeal.

Mr. THOMAS inquired by whom the motion had been made to proceed to the orders of the day.

Mr. MANN said he had made the motion.

Mr. THOMAS appealed to Mr. MANN to withdraw the motion that the House proceed to the orders of the day. He said it appeared to him to be but reasonable to permit the members who composed the minority of the Committee of Ways and Means to make explanations verbally in lieu of a report. Such a course had been often pursued in the House on grave occasions. It was but a courteous and customary indulgence. Let the speeches of the minority go forth with the report of the majority, and the public would be put in possession of both sides of the question.

The CHAIR reminded the gentleman that the question was not debatable.

Mr. THOMAS asked permission to remind the gentleman of an instance in which the members of a committee, who were in the minority in the House, had been indulged. He referred to the case of the bank committee in 1832. In that case, the four members of the committee who were against the bank had been permitted, by almost a unanimous vote of the House, when the friends of the bank had a decided majority, to submit verbal explanations. Other instances could, with great facility, be referred to, but it was unnecessary.

Mr. MANN said he wished the same opportunity afforded to him that had been given to the gentleman from Tennessee.

The CHAIR remarked, that if appeals were taken to enter into debate, that debate must be confined to the question of order.

Mr. MANN wished the same indulgence extended to him as to others.

The CHAIR would put the question on proceeding to the orders of the day.

The House again refused: Ayes 73, noes 86.

Mr. MANN then made the point of order on the 103d rule, (as given above.)

The CHAIR said it did not appear to him, upon the face of the bill, that it required commitment. Did it propose an imposition of duties, and thereby a tax or charge upon the people? It appeared to him not; and he could not, therefore, take upon himself to decide that it must necessarily go to a Committee of the Whole. That, however, was a matter for the sound discretion of the House, who would decide it upon reasons of expediency or propriety, as it saw fit.

Mr. MANN observed that, from this decision, he felt himself bound to take an appeal, and upon that appeal he was not disposed to enter largely into the question, because it seemed to him that it was so obvious, under the 103d rule of the House, and former decisions made thereon, which must be within the recollection of every gentleman who has had the honor of a seat there for any length of time, that this subject ought to be committed. Mr. M. then said that the case was not a parallel one with that which the gentleman from Maryland had alluded to. It would be recollected by the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. THOMAS,] that in the case of the bank committee the minority brought in their report at the same time with the majority; and this had been the practice so long as he recollected. That case, then, was not a parallel one with this.

Mr. CAMBRELENG observed that it was proper for him to state that no report of the minority of the committee had ever been presented to the consideration of the Committee of Ways and Means.

The CHAIR remarked that that fact would have no bearing on the question before the House.

JAN. 11, 1857.]

Surplus Revenue.

[H. OF R.]

Mr. INGERSOLL, by the permission of the House, stated that the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means was correct in what he had said. Mr. I. had been instructed to prepare a report on the part of the minority; but the minority determined, subsequently, that, because the measure might have the appearance of being brought in on party considerations, they would make no minority report, but leave every member of the committee to give his own views, when the subject came before the House.

Mr. MANN said that, on this question of order, he would like to inquire of honorable gentlemen or the Chair, if they did not consider this proposition to be a charge upon the people. Suppose it be passed into a law, what would be its operation? Would any gentleman rise and tell him that under the law, if it ever became a law, it would not collect a tax, or raise a revenue, from the people of the United States? Could you collect the tax without this law, if you pass it? The provisions of the bill are, that after such and such dates and times, the revenue to be raised will be such and such sums? He asserted, then, that it was as much a bill to raise revenue as it would be possible for the Committee of Ways and Means to draw up. On its face it had the appearance of being a bill to reduce the revenue; but when you come to apply its provisions, in its broadest terms, it would be seen that its purpose and object were to raise a revenue. Was it not by its title a revenue bill? Now, judging from the course adopted by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LAWRENCE] on the introduction of this bill, it must be supposed that he considered it a revenue bill; and a bill which, to him, being largely engaged in the manufacturing business, was extremely odious, so much so that that gentleman found it necessary to promulgate his sentiments to the House, and to the world, even before the provisions of the bill were understood. Mr. M. considered that, by the rule, this bill ought to be committed, so that gentlemen might have time to prepare their sentiments; and, as a member of the House who was, perhaps, to be in the minority on this question, he must claim the protection of those rules, so that he might have time to prepare his sentiments, and send them out to the world along with those of the gentleman from Massachusetts, and refute the assertions of the gentleman that Mr. M's constituents were opposed to this measure.

Was he to sit there and hear the gentleman from Massachusetts send out to the world a statement that his (Mr. M's) constituents were opposed to this bill, and have no opportunity to refute it? He hoped not. Mr. M. had been long enough on that floor to find out that there were indirect as well as direct means of getting an opportunity of expressing one's sentiments.

Mr. VINTON rose to a point of order. He considered the gentleman was not in order in this debate.

The CHAIR said he considered the gentleman from New York was taking too wide a range.

Mr. MANN hoped, as the gentleman from Massachusetts had been permitted to express his sentiments so fully, he might have leave to proceed. With a view to give the Chair an opportunity to search for precedents, Mr. M. had moved that the House proceed to the orders of the day; but as the House had seen fit to decide otherwise, and this debate was continued, he hoped gentlemen would not complain if the debate was a little extended on this appeal; and if they did complain, he asked them to apply the rules upon which they uttered the complaint to themselves. He asked gentlemen to put their hands upon their own breasts, and say whether they had any just grounds of complaint. This bill had been met with the most bitter and unusual opposition. Important as the character of it was, motions had been made to lay it on the table on its first reading. Why not let it take the ordinary course, and let it go to the Committee of the Whole? Were they to understand that the gentleman from Massachusetts was totally opposed to a reduction of taxes on the people? If so, he should like to hear the gentleman proclaim it on that floor. He considered that this rule was misconstrued and misapplied at a time when it should have the most liberal construction.

Mr. OWENS stated that, when the bill was sent to the Chair, he had moved that the bill and report be read in extenso; and when the reading of the report had been concluded, the bill went immediately to its second reading. After that, the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means [Mr. CAMBRELENG] rose and moved that it be committed to a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union; and upon that motion being made, the gentleman from Massachusetts made his objections. He presumed that this fact must be within the recollection of every member.

Mr. MANN was aware that this bill had been read a second time by its title, because he had paid particular attention to it at the time; therefore, to reject it without a single moment's consideration would be treating this important question with great disrespect. He had taken the appeal for the purpose of preserving a correct administration of the rules of the House, and he trusted that the Chair, upon reflection, would decide in accordance with Mr. M's views.

Mr. VANDERPOEL said that there could be no doubt that the decision of the Speaker was correct; but before he said what he had to say upon the point immediately under discussion, he would remark that he was not at all surprised at the sensibility which many gentlemen had discovered at the introduction of this bill. It was a bill which, if it became a law, would materially, if not vitally, affect great interests, that had sprung up under, and been fostered by, the past legislation of the country; and no gentleman, who had a faint idea of the force and magnitude of the manufacturing interest of the country, could have reasonably imagined that a bill of this description could be here introduced without producing much ferment and agitation. It was not, therefore, strange that the minority of the committee should be anxious that their views in relation to this all-important subject should go forth with the report of the majority. An elaborate and able report, assailing the whole protective policy recognised by past legislation, had just been read to us; and for his part, without, at this stage of the bill, avowing himself either for or against it, he thought it but just and reasonable that the minority of the committee should be permitted, if they desired to do so, to express their dissent to its doctrines and conclusions, that they thus might be able to send forth to the people the antidote to what they evidently conceived to be a bane. They surely, according to all parliamentary usage, had the right to present a minority report; and if, instead of availing themselves of this privilege, they saw fit to give us here an oral exposition of their grounds of dissent, we ought not, when we considered the importance of the subject, to deny to them this privilege. He owed it to himself to explain the motive that had impelled him, a few moments ago, to submit the motion that the House proceed to the orders of the day. He surely did not make this motion with the view of muzzling the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. LAWRENCE,] who then had the floor, but because there was another subject before the House, which, in justice to the executive departments of this Government, ought to be immediately disposed of. It had already contributed to the consumption of too much of the precious time of this House; and, until it was finally acted upon, it would frustrate every effort to enter upon or execute the important matters that demanded our attention. There was poor Michigan knocking at our door, with a perfect right to be admitted, and yet postponed, day after day, to the stale standing dish that was presented to us by the resolution of the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. WISE.] Here was just interposed a new subject of infinite moment, that might possibly consume the residue of the session; and, important as it was, he felt anxious, when he made the motion to proceed to the orders of the day, to rid ourselves, before we entered upon a new matter, of that great hook to hang interminable speeches on, (he meant the resolution of the gentleman from Virginia.) The days of this Congress would very soon be numbered; and if we continued, as we hitherto had done, to rush into new subjects before we had finished the one on hand, we would, at the end of the session, be entitled to the merit of having been very busy without having accomplished any thing.

He would now add a remark or two in relation to the appeal now under consideration. It was contended by his colleague, [Mr. MANN,] that this bill could not be discussed to-day, because one of the rules of this House provided that "no motion or proposition for a tax or charge upon the people shall be discussed the day on which it is made or offered; and every such proposition shall receive its first discussion in a Committee of the Whole House." Mr. V. said he knew not what the precedents were upon the point—whether this bill must, under this rule, be committed—but he knew what they ought to be. The bill under consideration surely was no proposition "for a tax or a charge upon the people." It was the very opposite of this. It was a proposition to relieve the people from charges and taxation, as its very title indicated. It was a bill "to bring down the revenues to the wants of the Government," and did not, therefore, come either within the letter or spirit of the rule. It was obvious that it did not come within the spirit of the rule, for no one could doubt as to the reason upon which the rule was founded. It had its origin in a belief that it was best to give all propositions to increase the burdens of the people such a direction as would secure to them the utmost care and deliberation. It was well known, that in a Committee of the Whole House we were more at liberty to amend, to discuss, and, if you please, expostulate, than in the House; and it was to guaranty this great privilege of free discussion that it had been wisely ordained that every proposition to tax or charge the people should receive its first discussion in a Committee of the Whole House. But this, being a proposition not to tax, but to relieve from taxation, is surely not subject to this rule.

But while he was very clear that the bill need not, ex necessitate, be committed to a Committee of the Whole House, he would certainly, when the proper time arrived, vote for its commitment, because he deemed it right that a bill of this importance should be committed. The question whether, as matter of expediency, it ought to be committed, was, however, very different from the question whether it must be committed, and thus precluded all debate on this day. He had not a doubt that the decision of the Speaker was right.

The point of order was further debated by Messrs. TOUCEY and SUTHERLAND.

The SPEAKER then reiterated the grounds of his decision, and Mr. MANN withdrew his appeal.

Mr. LAWRENCE said he was very sorry that any remarks of his should have been the cause of consuming so much time of the House; and nothing but the peculiar position which he occupied, as a member of the Committee of Ways and Means, would have induced him to trespass on its attention. Occupying that position, he felt himself bound to protest against this bill, as being a project as monstrous as any that had ever been presented to the people of the United States. When interrupted, Mr. L. said, he had remarked that he had a word to say to the cotton growers of the country in relation to this bill. What he meant to say to them was, that they have some interest in this great question. They have a common interest, as well as the manufacturers, in the prosperity of the Union; and they have a particular interest in this bill besides, in regard to their own staple. From data before him, it was demonstrable that the quantity of cotton consumed in the United States at this moment is equal to what the whole crop of the country was in the year 1820, some sixteen or seventeen years ago. This he stated as a fact not to be disputed. And the consumption here, moreover, is at this time as great as the consumption was in England two or three and twenty years ago. We consume now, in the manufactures of this country, more than a fifth, and nearly a fourth, of the whole present crop of cotton. Was it nothing, besides, to the growers of cotton that Great Britain, the great consumer of our cotton, is actually now importing it from every country that produces it? Is that nothing to the producer of it in this country? And is this a time to reduce and almost destroy the consumption of it here?

But, Mr. L. said, he would not now go into this subject at large—he might do so on some other fitting occasion. He had risen this morning, not with a view to make a speech, but to wash his hands, as a member of the Financial Committee, of any share in the production of this bill, or the report which accompanies it. He owed it, he said, to himself—he owed it to his constituents—he owed it to his country—to do so, because he believed the bill fraught with every sort of mischief, amongst which was its direct tendency to increase the existing embarrassment in the commercial communities. For himself, he said, he had no ulterior political objects to serve by his course in this House on this or any other question; he asked for nothing, he feared nothing; he was neither an office-holder nor an office-seeker. But his object in addressing the chairman was to ascertain, and let the country know, whether this bill was or was not a political measure. He had had no opportunity to ascertain that fact. I would like to know, said he, whether there is any concert of action here upon this bill among the administration party. The country ought to know, and to know at once, whether this be a party measure or not. I hope, sir, that it is not. For that reason, sir, it was that I appealed to the Representatives from Connecticut, as deeply interested in this question as any State in the Union; to the Representatives from New Hampshire, from Rhode Island, from all New England, and from Pennsylvania; the latter the authors (I was going to say) and the consistent supporters of the protective system. I now call upon them all to rise in their places and say whether they are going for this bill. I want the country to know this. It is due to the people that they should know whether a bill is going to pass this House, by the votes of those Representatives, which will prostrate to the earth most important interests of the country. I profess, sir, some practical knowledge of the subject; and I pronounce this bill fraught with consequences fatal to thousands of individuals. It has been said that a bill embracing such provisions as the bill now before the House is a bill for the benefit of the poor. Sir, I deny the truth of the proposition. This is a bill the title of which should be, a bill to make the rich richer, and the poor poorer.

Mr. L. here traced the passage of such a bill as this to its probable consequences. He supposed the case of an individual in Pennsylvania, or in Connecticut, engaged in manufactures, the cost of whose buildings and fixtures has been ten thousand dollars, upon which (a common case) there was a mortgage for one half the cost. To pay off this mortgage, when his employment for his machinery fails, his property is sold. Who buys it? Is it the poor man who purchases in such cases? Not at all; but he who has redundant capital. What is now the case, Mr. L. asked, in those parts of the country where pecuniary pressure is felt? Go into your cities, and you will find that the men who have a small or a middling property are paying at the rate of from 15 to 30 per cent. per annum for money. Who is it that is reaping the profit? Is it the poor man? No, sir, it is the rich capitalist, or those who are allowed to use his capital. If there was ever a system devised on earth to throw the property of the country into the hands of the few, at the expense of the many, it is the present financial system of the United States. I know it, sir, and I am willing that my judgment of the matter shall go to the country, for every practical man will know that what I say is true. Ay, sir, and the bill on your table goes to a much further extent than this, for it reaches the labor of the country. In one month after the passage of this bill, the business of every manufacturer and dealer in the country will be contracted. It is not the large capitalist, protected by his money-bags, who will feel its direct effects, but the laborer—the mechanic, who now gets two dollars or two dollars and a half a day. To him the employer says, on receiving information of the passage of this bill, I must stop my work! Oh, no! says the laborer, for you will take from me my means of support. Well, says the employer, I will, in order to keep you at work, give you henceforth a dollar a day instead of what I have heretofore given you. Gentlemen may flatter themselves that they are exempt from the operations of this bill; but no man, whatever his condition in life may be, is beyond the deleterious effects of this bill if it become a law. Mr. L. was sure, he said, that the Representatives from the Western States, or from the Southern, were not going for this bill. The Representatives from the Southern States, especially, would not go for it when the profits of their cotton crops were already in a process of reduction; for, although he knew that the crop of this year was a large one, the proceeds of that crop will fall far short of the proceeds of the crop of last year.

Mr. L. said it was not only to protest against the principles of this bill that he had risen, but to ask of the gentlemen in this House who have the power to do what they will—to pass this bill or to defeat it—whether this bill was to be considered as a proclamation issued by the present dynasty in the Government, or as a decisive token of the course of measures which we have to expect at the hands of the coming administration. For, he did not hesitate to say, if it is produced as a party measure, it will become the law of the land; but if not, by the aid of the Representatives of Pennsylvania, New Hampshire, Ohio, and Maine, whose constituents were so deeply interested in the matter, with those from at least a portion of the South, the bill might providentially be defeated. But, be that as it might, it was the imperative duty of the House to declare to the country, at once, immediately, whether or not it was probable that any bill like this would pass during the present Congress.

Mr. L. said that, whilst he was up, and as he might not have another opportunity, he would say one word on the state of the currency of the country. In the first place, said he, the domestic exchanges of the country are far greater in amount than all the gold and all the silver and all the bank notes in circulation—a vast deal greater. These exchanges are not now available to any great extent. To a very large amount they cannot be used, in consequence of the position in which, by its measures, the Government has placed the country. He meant no reflection upon the banks; for it is their interest to do all the business that they can, and they do it.

But the channels of domestic exchange are obstructed, from the want of ability on the part of the banks; and a considerable proportion of our commercial difficulties arises out of that circumstance. Add to this and other causes the introduction of this bill, with the expectation that it is to become the law of the land, and you will produce a state of things the like of which very few members of this House have ever seen.

Mr. CORWIN obtained the floor; but the hour being late, he gave way to a motion for adjournment; and The House adjourned.

LIGHT-BOATS NEAR SANDY HOOK.

Mr. McKEON, by consent, offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce be instructed to inquire into the expediency of placing light-boats on Flynn's Knoll and the Roamer, near Sandy Hook; and also into the expediency of publishing the charts now in the office of the superintendent of the coast survey.

Mr. McKEON was understood to state that he had offered this resolution in consequence of the dreadful shipwreck of the "Mexico."

Mr. UNDERWOOD said he did not rise to object to the resolution, but to suggest to the member from New York the propriety of making an amendment to it. He was told that the loss of the ship alluded to was attributable to the fact that no pilot was to be obtained. This pilot system, Mr. U. understood, was under the direction of the State Government. He wished to inquire whether the system ought not to be put under the charge of the Government of the United States.

Mr. McKEON was understood to say that a resolution directed to that very object had heretofore been submitted by himself, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The resolution was then adopted.

SURPLUS REVENUE.

The business first in order was the bill reported yesterday by Mr. CAMBRELENG, from the Committee of Ways and Means, to reduce the revenue of the United States to the wants of the Government; there being two motions pending—first for commitment, and secondly for indefinite postponement.

Mr. CORWIN rose and addressed the House as follows:

Mr. Speaker: I feel deeply sensible that I am about to occupy the time of the House upon a subject which cannot possibly be matured into legislation during the brief period that remains to us of the present session. It is the conviction that the bill before you, ushered into this House with a haste bordering upon rashness, contains within its provisions principles too momentous and vitally affecting a large portion of the country to be acted upon this session, that impels me to solicit the attention of the House to my reasons for sustaining the motion of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LAWRENCE] for the indefinite postponement of the bill. Sir, I am not sure that my thorough conviction of the necessity of tranquilizing the public agitation, which the presence of this bill here will excite, by an immediate rejection or postponement of it, would have overcome my habitual aversion to addressing the House, had I not, in common with my friends from Massachusetts and Pennsylvania, felt that such a course could alone insure the minority of the committee, with whom the bill originated, against misunderstanding, as well here as amongst those whom we represent. Had the motion to lay the bill and report on the table, and print them, prevailed, a paper most elaborate in its structure, and voluminous in its dimensions, would have gone forth to the country, bearing upon its face no intimation that the whole committee did not concur in it. To prevent the possibility of such misconception, I feel it a duty to those who have honored me with a seat here to present my protest, against both the bill and the report which accompanies it, at the earliest moment possible. This poor privilege, sir, we had been denied yesterday, by the House, but for the timely substitution, by my friend from Massachusetts, [Mr. LAWRENCE,] of the motion for "indefinite postponement" for that which was made by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. CAMBRELENG.] The latter motion, by the strict law of Parliament, did not permit the minority of the committee to utter even a syllable by way of dissent to the principles of the bill or the report. Courtesy, however, it seems, had uniformly conceded to a minority thus situated, what the rigid rule denied; but in our case, the gentleman from New York [Mr. MANN] pertinaciously insisted on the letter of the law. Courtesy became inconvenient, and the "iron rule" of proscription was enforced. Permit me here, Mr. Speaker, to offer my thanks to the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. THOMAS] for his manly appeal to the House in our behalf. Such exhibitions of magnanimity are rare in these times, and ought not to pass unnoticed. I did desire, sir, to see the bill disposed of without entering into a debate on its merits; but as no explanation could be even hinted at without it, I am rejoiced that the present motion was made, which opens the entire measure proposed to free and full discussion.

I shall have occasion to refer to the report, as that is the exposition presented of the principles and policy on which the bill is based. In doing this, as I have only heard it read, and have not had the advantage of a perusal of its contents, I cannot pretend to quote its language, nor can I hope to be exact in giving even its substance. I am happy to see the honorable chairman of the Ways and Means [Mr. CAMBRELENG] in his seat, who will set me right should I at any time unwittingly mistake or misrepresent the true import of his production. I am very sure the gentleman will discharge such a duty to himself and to me with the utmost alacrity. As he, I doubt not, regards this, the youngest of his financial progeny, as possessing every combination of symmetry and grace, he will not sit by and see its beauty marred, without instant interposition in its behalf.

The most obvious objection to the introduction of this bill arises from a view of its intrinsic importance, and the difficult and delicate questions which are inseparable from any proposition which proposes a radical change in the existing tariff. The whole of the argument in the very voluminous report, which is nothing but the bill on your table, with a few facts and inferences to prop and sustain it, may be condensed into one or two sentences of plain English. It is stated (and I shall not now attempt to controvert any fact to which I shall have occasion to refer) that the existing tariff extends protection to labor employed in manufacturing in this country, the annual product of which is $300,000,000. It is assumed (and, for the sake of the argument, I shall admit it) that the protection afforded by our existing tariff laws is necessary, and no more than is necessary, to enable our own manufacturing establishments to exist in competition with foreign establishments employed in the same business. To sustain this proposition, the high price of labor and capital with us, and the comparative cheapness of both abroad, are asserted.

The report further asserts that the duties collected on imports by the rates established by the law of March, 1833, commonly called the compromise act, will, with the proceeds of the sales of public lands, bring into the Treasury, within the next eighteen months, more revenue, by seven millions of dollars, than the wants of the Government require. Here I beg gentlemen to observe that this last proposition is nothing more nor less than a combination of two conjectures. The first of these is, that the importations from abroad to this country, during the next five years, will reach a given amount. Whether this conjecture shall be verified must depend upon the numberless contingent events, the turn of which no human sagacity can foresee, arising out of the present unsettled condition of trade, labor, and currency, in Great Britain; the change that may be brought about in the markets of England by the termination of the intestine wars now raging in Spain and Portugal; and, lastly, the very capability of this country to consume and pay for foreign importations must depend upon reducing to order and stability the currency of this country, which, under the improving and sagacious guidance of this administration, has been conducted to a state of wild and unmanageable confusion. The next conjecture embodied in the proposition I have last stated from the report is, that the public lands are to be sold without any legislative or executive restraints as to purchasers or quantities. In other words, it supposes the famous Treasury circular to be repealed. I beg the gentlemen of the far West particularly to notice one feature of this report. It is based upon the supposition that the bill now on your table, reported by one of your standing committees, with that title so captivating to patriot ears, "A bill to arrest monopolies of public lands, and to prohibit the sales thereof, except to actual settlers, in limited quantities," is to be scouted, thrown out of doors, and its place to be supplied by this more recent and happy assault upon the popular ear, bearing on its front the charmed phrase, "A bill to reduce the revenue of the United States to the wants of the Government."

The House will bear in mind that this bill proposes to remedy an apprehended evil. It looks into the future, and imagines that, in the next year and a half, the existing duties on imports will bring into the Treasury more money than is required for the uses of the Government by seven millions of dollars. I have already intimated that I object to the time selected for bringing into the House a measure fraught with so many difficulties as belonging to every subject which proposes a radical change in our system of revenue.

Without adverting, therefore, for the present, to the merits of the bill, I feel confident I do not appeal in vain to the House to say that we cannot act upon it between this day and the 4th of March. Let gentlemen look at the necessary business now before us, and then calculate the number of days remaining for its final disposition. It will be remembered that Monday in every week is devoted to the reception of petitions; Friday and Saturday of each week, by another standing rule, are set apart for private claims. From what we have already seen during half the allotted term of the session, it is not to be expected that a moment of time can be withdrawn from that allotted to petitions, for the consideration of other business. No gentleman, I am equally sure, dreams that we should deny justice any longer than is unavoidable to the many hundreds of private claims which have been favorably reported on by that committee whose awards, with rare exceptions, are considered laws to the House. There is a large body of claimants of a miscellaneous character in one class, and the crippled soldiers and widows and orphans, the representatives of those who have fallen in your late wars with both civilized and savage foes, in another, and a not less meritorious few of the surviving veterans of your revolutionary struggle in another class, all pointing to the reports of your own committee, and showing claims upon your justice, some of them delayed for half a century. I cannot entertain so poor an opinion of the moral sense of an American Congress as to suppose it will turn aside from this work of justice and benevolence, to enter into dreamy and heartless disquisitions upon the balance of trade; to ponder over tabular statements as incomprehensible as the Sybilline books; to adjust with contemptible accuracy the ad valorem duty on a foreign penknife, and this, too, for the purpose of preventing a few millions more or less from coming into that very Treasury whose doors, in the mean time, you close against those who demand of you the payment of your honest debts, for the non-payment of which many of your creditors are languishing in poverty and want.

Surplus Revenue.

You have then remaining for the despatch of general legislation three days in each week, giving about twenty-two days for the consideration of bills of a general nature, and all the appropriations for the current year. I ask the majority of the Ways and Means, who have pushed this new and perplexing subject on the House at this time, if it is modest, to say the least of it, to suppose that the House is to vote away twenty-four millions of dollars in appropriations, without inquiry, examination, or debate, further than to ask whether the Committee of Ways and Means desire it should be done? I ask this House, whose constitutional and most important function it is to know and approve the object to which every dollar is to be applied, before it sanctions its appropriation, whether it is willing, at the mere request of a committee, to give a draft on the Treasury for nearly thirty millions of dollars, and thus become the mere ministerial agent of the Treasury Department? This base abandonment of duty you must submit to, to this humiliation you must come, if you turn aside from the necessary duties of the session to consider the bill now before you; unless, indeed, you choose to rush madly upon an untried scheme, full of danger, and surrounded with doubt, upon the very reasonable presumption of the infallible wisdom of its authors.

But, Mr. Speaker, if we had all the time we could desire, for the adjustment of a new system of legislation to any real or supposed change in our condition at home, or with other nations, is this an auspicious period for the experiment? Turn for a moment to your latest advices from England. Every painful pulsation in that great heart of capital and trade is followed by a sympathetic throb on this side of the Atlantic. What is the state of currency throughout Great Britain now? The price of money rising, the banks stopping payment, and her financiers unable to foretell the time or the manner when or how this agitation shall end. Nor is our situation free from symptoms of coming misfortune. I shall not stop to inquire into the causes of the present anomalous situation of our own currency. My friend from Massachusetts, [Mr. LAWRENCE,] who addressed you with so much force and clearness yesterday, has left nothing to be said by any one on these topics. Sir, the results of that gentleman's actual experience, the reflections of his sound understanding, always aided by the promptings of a good heart, are with me better authority, on such subjects, than a thousand quartos filled with speculations of closeted economists. We all know that, from some cause, trade and currency seem to be divorced from each other; domestic exchanges are no longer regulated by the course of trade, and the very report on your table complains of a redundant paper circulation. Who can tell when the causes which have produced these effects shall cease to operate? Who can say in what they will finally issue? In this distracted state of things, what are we asked to do? We are required to enact a law that shall tear from its very foundations, where they have rested for twenty years on the faith of your laws, a capital and labor which produce property equal to three hundred millions of dollars a year. Is this a time to force such an amount of capital into new employment? Is this that period of calm when so much labor can safely be driven, with sudden violence, to abandon its safe and tried pursuits, and seek at once other and unaccustomed channels? No, surely this is not that time. On the contrary, it would add another to many elements of confusion already but too extensively and actively at work. Sir, it does seem to me that the unsettled state of the internal commerce and currency of this country is of itself an unanswerable objection to the present enactment of a law that all must see will powerfully increase the evils that already deeply afflict us. The natural instinct of brute animals, in such a crisis, would suggest caution and prudence as the course of wisdom, not rash adventure and wild experiment. If it were bad policy to protect by imposts the industry of your own people, if it could be shown to be unpatriotic and un-American to cherish by duties manufacturing skill, so that in time of war you might be able to furnish the commonest necessities of life to your own people, still having done so, however unwisely at first, since by doing it you have created an immense amount of property, it would be madness, moon-struck madness, to crush that property at a blow. Sir, by the laws now in force, if you but let them alone, in five years, by your own showing, the evil of which you now complain will cease to exist. Instead of this, we are now asked, in order to get rid of seven millions of surplus revenue, to destroy an annual production of three hundred millions; and are gravely told that this will be a most salutary financial operation. Let gentlemen keep constantly in mind that the bill and report go upon the admission (at least it is not otherwise asserted) that the duties now imposed are barely sufficient to enable our own manufacturers to continue their business. With the single exception of iron, the report on your table will, I think, be found to be in substance as I have quoted it. If, then, you diminish that protection by curtailing it in the short space of eighteen months by seven millions, which by the law now in force would not be done till the end of five years, it follows, as a necessary conclusion, that you do abandon capital and labor, to the amount I have stated, to instant and total destruction.

Mr. Speaker, I have only suggested so much of the merits of the subject as I deem necessary to direct the attention of the House to the importance and number of the questions which we are called upon to decide, before we can safely vote for or against the bill. If, then, reflection requires time, if the exercise of reason is an agent in our researches after truth, if knowledge is not intuitive, we poor mortals, who are not gifted with those inspirations which seem to be the peculiar attributes of the authors of this bill and report, must beg a moment's pause before we decide. We must plod on in the old beaten way. We must proceed by painful and slow research; we must stop, look around us, and reflect much; and after great toil, and a long journey, we may possibly reach those lofty heights of transcendental political wisdom which the authors of this bill have scaled with the speed of lightning at a single bound. Is it to be expected, I again ask, that, in the twenty-two days that remain for general business, we can canvass, item by item, appropriation bills to the amount of near twenty-seven millions, and have time left us to labor through the difficulties that attend the bill under consideration?

Mr. Speaker, in connexion with the objections to a consideration of this bill, arising from a want of time, I must remind its authors, and the political majority of this House, of another subject, which, in justice to themselves and to the nation, they are bound to bring forward at the present session. I allude to an amendment of the constitution, so that the election of President and Vice President of the United States may, in no event, ever devolve on Congress. We are now approaching the termination of those eight years during which General Jackson has occupied the presidential chair. I believe each annual message to Congress, during all that time, has adverted in strong and sometimes imploring appeals to the National Legislature on this subject. I know that gentlemen have heretofore excused their neglect of these suggestions of the President, by saying that there was in the Senate a political majority opposed to them, and therefore the great reform, so much desired by the President and his friends, must wait till that opposition was subdued. Sir, whether fortunately or otherwise for the republic I will not say, but the fact is, that favored time, so long prayed for, has at length arrived. There is now a clear majority, in both branches of Congress, friendly to the existing administration. Now, a time has at length come, when we may with confidence call upon the friends of General Jackson to redeem his and their pledges, so often given, on this vital subject. I call especially at this time for action, and not promises and postponement. General Jackson, after this session, will be no more here, to admonish or advise us touching this interesting subject. It has made an imposing figure in that revolution which has subverted all the maxims of polity and law, whensoever and howsoever they were opposed to his suggestions. It has been a theme on which honest patriots and designing demagogues have dwelt with equal skill and power. The President, for the last time that his voice can ever be heard in public council, in language which bespeaks deep and abiding solicitude, again beseeches you to act. Hear what he says in his last message to Congress. Nearly at the close, and when he is about to bid a final adieu to you and the cares of public life, he gives this subject to your especial charge with all the solemnity of a dying declaration. He says: "All my experience and reflection confirm the conviction I have so often expressed to Congress in favor of an amendment to the constitution which will prevent, in any event, the election of President and Vice President of the United States devolving on the House of Representatives and the Senate; and I therefore beg leave again to solicit your attention to the subject."

Is there, then, any reason now for not carrying this recommendation into effect, by the party having the power in both House and Senate to do so? None. I call, then, upon the "democratic party," as you of the majority sometimes (as if in derision of the name) call yourselves, to postpone this new experiment on finance; dispose of it at once for this year, because it stands in the way of a constitutional reform, on which, by your own admission, depends all your hope of liberty. Do this, or take the consequences. If you now refuse to act when you have the undoubted power to redeem your pledges, so often and solemnly given, the people of this country will believe that all your promises and professions were not the promptings of patriotism, but rather the hollow and selfish artifices of a shallow hypocrisy. However uncharitable some gentlemen might deem such a conclusion to be, in my judgment it would be most reasonable and just. Our conduct admits of no other explanation, if we consume the time allowed us in discussing the difference between two systems of revenue, and pass by unnoticed another subject which, by our own declarations, repeated in every form, touches our existence as a free people.

Sir, I might here content myself with thus expressing my objections to the introduction of this bill, at this time, by the committee of which I am a member. I have endeavored to satisfy the House that the necessary bills, without the passage of which the Government cannot execute its ordinary duties during the year, must occupy us the entire remainder of the session; and if we should possibly have any time not thus necessarily employed, that there are other matters of high and paramount national importance, which should take precedence of this. But there is another objection resting with great weight on my mind, which I cannot forbear to press upon the attention of gentlemen before I take my seat. I allude to the compromise act, as it is familiarly called, of March, 1833. If I am right in my conceptions of the true character of that law, we are not only forbidden to legislate in the way now proposed at this time, but that we cannot so legislate until after the 30th of June, 1842, without such sacrifice of honor and implied faith as would make a bandit blush.

I shall not pretend that Congress has not the power to alter essentially, or, if it will, abolish, the law fixing the rates of duties on a scale of gradual reduction from 1833 up to 1842; but I deny the right of Congress to do so, unless impelled by some dire necessity, over which it can exert no control. War, that greatest of all the ills that can befall a well-governed people, might present a case of such necessity. No such necessity is pretended. No gentleman here will risk his character for sanity, by rising in his place and declaring that, without a law like that on your table, the liberties or happiness of the people are in danger. No man, here or elsewhere, can pretend that the compromise act of the 2d of March, 1833, contains any principle which menaces the general welfare of the country, or that its operation and effects threaten our national prosperity with imminent danger. On the contrary, sir, the echoes of that general note of acclaim, which reverberated from one extremity of the Union to the other, at the passage of that law, are at this moment scarcely silenced. Our circumstances are not changed since the passage of that law, in any way connected with its provisions or policy. Hence I infer that, as that law, in its terms, fixes the measure of protection which shall be extended to domestic manufactures up to the year 1842, and as it was considered in the light of an arrangement, permanent up to that time, by the Congress who enacted it; and, further, as it was so regarded by both the friends and foes of the protective system, all over the country, and as those engaged in manufacturing shaped their business, and disposed their capital, in conformity to this general opinion, although you have the power, you have no right now to annul your understood engagement, when, by so doing, a capital and labor so great as to produce three hundred millions a year, which have been invested under the faith thus pledged, must be at once destroyed. By altering essentially, as you propose to do, the act of 1833, you bring upon this labor and capital what is equal to destruction; you sever them by violence from their present business connexions, and leave them to the mercy of accident for future occupation. I beg gentlemen to turn to the law of 1833, and see how all the features of a compact and permanent engagement are carefully impressed upon it.

The first section, taking up the protected articles, or such as paid a duty above twenty per centum ad valorem, subjects them to a scale of gradual reduction from 1833, until all are brought down to a duty of twenty per centum ad valorem in 1842. Why were the several periodical reductions adjusted so carefully through a period of nine years, if the law was not expected to continue in force for that length of time? Let any gentleman reflect on the history of that law for a moment, and he can have no further difficulty in finding the principles of a permanent compromise in it. Two great parties, as we all know, existed in the country. These were known by the designations of tariff and anti-tariff. The anti-tariff party, chiefly comprised in the Southern and Southwestern sections of the Union, demanded an abandonment of the protective principle, and a reduction of duties to a revenue standard alone. They alleged, that as they were consumers, and not producers of those articles which were protected by law, they paid to the producer (in the protective duty) a bounty upon his labor; and insisted on the injustice of thus taxing the planting States for the benefit of the Northern manufacturing States. Such was the argument on one side, whether correct or not I shall not here pause to consider. On the other side, those friendly to the protective system alleged that the policy of protection was begun early in the history of the Government; that especially since 1816 it had been pursued with such vigor and constancy as not only to invite capital but actually to impel it into the business of domestic manufacture. They insisted, and with the most obvious reason, that to withdraw suddenly that protection would result in ruin to the capitalists, and wide-spread misery to the laboring classes. They proposed a system of gradual reduction of duties, which would give time for the acquisition of skill, so as to enable them to operate with little or no protection, or, at the worst, (if time were given,) a gradual and comparatively harmless withdrawal of their capital and labor from manufacturing pursuits could be effected. To this proposition the South acceded, and its substance will be found embodied in the law of 1833. Thus gradual reduction, extending through a series of years to 1842, saved the manufacturer, while the prospective reduction of duties on all protected articles to one standard satisfied the principles contended for by the South. When this was settled, to make it binding and irrevocable till 1842, the parties inserted in the third section of the bill their solemn declaration to that effect. The section referred to reads as follows: "And be it further enacted, That until the thirtieth day of June, one thousand eight hundred and forty-two, the duties imposed by existing laws, as modified by this act, shall remain and continue to be collected." Could your language furnish words more emphatically expressive of a declaration by Congress that no change was to be made in this branch of your revenue system till June, 1842? Did you then expect your people to place no reliance on what you thus solemnly proclaimed as your determination? No; you did not expect the American people to treat you as hollow-hearted knaves, attempting to impose on their credulity. The sole object of proclaiming to them the unalterable character of the law of 1833 was to quiet the fearful agitation that then every where prevailed, and give stability to that interest—the manufacturing interest—which was most to be affected by your acts. What, sir, were the happy, the glorious effects of that compromise? The day before that law received the President's approval was overcast with the gathering cloud of civil war, deepening, spreading, and blackening every hour. The ground on which we stood seemed to heave and quake with the first throes of a convulsion; that was to rend in fragments the last republic on earth; at this fearful moment an overruling Providence revealed the instrument of its will in the person of one man, whose virtues would have illustrated the brightest annals of recorded time. He produced this great measure of concord, and the succeeding morning dawned upon the American horizon without a spot; the sun of that day looked down, and beheld us a tranquil and united people.

Are we prepared now to break the bonds of peace, and renew the war? I have said you have the power to do so, but I deny your right. I do not measure that right by the standard of law in a municipal court. I cannot conceive any idea more ridiculous or contemptible than that which finds no standard of moral or political duties and rights, for a Christian, a private gentleman, or a statesman, except that which is applicable to a contest before a justice's court, or a nisi prius jury. No, sir, I appeal to a law in the bosom of man, prior and paramount to this. I appeal to the South, where I know that law will be obeyed, and where I know I do not appeal in vain. I invoke its characteristic chivalry. I call for that sentiment of manly pride which is its offspring. I summon to my aid that sensitive honor which feels "a stain like a wound," which abhors deception, and shudders at violated faith. Will that South, which I am sure I have truly described, join in this odious infraction of its own treaty, and unite in this miserable war upon the laboring thousands who have confided in its securities—a war not waged with open force and strong hand—a war not waged to avenge insulted honor, but to recover the difference between five and ten cents duty upon a yard of cotton goods? Your approach to this battle is not heralded by the trumpet's voice; no, you are to take the proposed bill, and go on a marauding expedition, by way of reprisal. You are to steal into the dwelling of the poor, and boldly capture a mechanic's dinner! You are to march into the cottage of the widow, and fearlessly confiscate the breakfast of a factory girl, for the benefit of the planting and grain-growing States of this mighty republic! Such are the motives for this war, and such are to be the trophies of its victories. How little do they who have presented such arguments as these, in this report, know of the character of the people of the South and West! They vainly imagine that the high-minded sons of the South have drank of the fatal cup of the sorceress, and, like the companions of Ulysses,

"Lost their upright shape,
And downward fell into the grovelling swine."

The great grain-growing States of the West are informed, in this report, that they may reclaim a part of the tribute which, it is told them, they have been paying without equivalent, if they will agree to this bill. Let me tell the gentlemen that the West must first be satisfied they are free in honor to obey this call. The hardy race that has subdued the forests of the West, and in their green youth have constructed monuments of their enterprise that shall survive the Pyramids, is not likely, from merely sordid motives, to join in inflicting a great evil on any portion of our common country. The fearless pioneers of the West, whose ears are as familiar with the sharp crack of the Indian's rifle, and his wild war-whoop at midnight, as are those of your city dandies with the dulcet notes of the harp and piano, they, sir, are not the men to act upon selfish calculations and sinister inducements. They hold their rights by law, and they believe that compacts, expressed or implied, arising from individual engagements or public law, are to be kept and defended with their lives, if need be—not to be broken at will, or regarded as the proper sport of legislative or individual caprice.

Mr. Speaker, we have heard much of late that is new to us, if not alarming, on this subject of legislative compact. From authorities of no mean consideration we have heard it boldly preached that the validity of a compact arising out of law is an exploded paradox. It is represented as a relic of "old times," and we are told that it is inconsistent with the liberties of the people. The liberties of the people! It was to establish "the liberties of the people" that Robespierre and his infamous associates preached the same doctrine to the deluded and frantic populace of France. Is the American Government now to adopt this creed of political faith? How long is it since we were about to wage war with France for refusing to fulfil a treaty which, in the language of our constitution, was nothing more than "the supreme law of the land?" For this we were ready to launch our thunders upon the seas, and arm our whole population for the contest on the land. We required the proud monarch of the most warlike nation of modern times to humble himself before the offended majesty of "public law." It is for a supposed violation of "public law" that your armies have been alternately hunting after, and lying before, the fierce Ocoola, for a whole year, through the lagoons and hammocks of Florida. It is not to be supposed that a people, thus acting, can be brought to disregard like obligations, whether contracted by express or implied compact, with its own citizens.

I hope, sir, I shall be pardoned for dwelling, it may be, somewhat too long upon this topic. I must now call the attention of the House for a few moments to what I deem a singular phenomenon in our history, as set forth in the report on your table. It is said that the planting and grain-growing States have, since 1789, paid to the manufacturers of this country about three hundred and fifty millions of dollars, for which they have received no equivalent. Sir, if this be true, since the Israelites were required by the Egyptian tyrant to make bricks without straw, there is no parallel to such monstrous oppression.

I have already stated that I will not pretend to quote the precise language of the report. I am sure it is stated that duties on imported articles to the amount of six hundred and eighty-two millions of dollars, besides thirty millions for its collection, have been paid since the year 1789. It is also stated in the report, that more than one half of this aggregate had been levied on protected articles. The whole scope of the report labors to prove that this duty on protected articles is a grievous and oppressive tax on consumption, for which no equivalent is received in return. Connected with these positions, the author of the report endeavors to show that the planting and grain-growing portions of the Union were, and are, the consumers, and the few Northern manufacturing States the producers, of the protected articles; that the former are the payers, and the latter the receivers, of the duties; which duties are represented as a mere bounty to the labor of the North, for which the South and West never have been, and, in the nature of things, never can be, reimbursed. Sir, I shall not now trouble the House, nor my friends, who put forward this fact as a truth proved by figures and tabular statements, with any argument opposed to it, but I must be allowed to advert to it as a Western man with feelings of pride. At the same time, I must, in common with others, labor under some doubts of the fact asserted, arising out of the known history of the last twenty or thirty years.

If the West and Southwest have paid their due proportion of this unjust and unremunerated tax of three hundred and fifty millions within the last forty years, while, at the same time, they have, as the world knows, conquered the savages who possessed the whole Western and Southwestern territory, cleared the thick forests which overshadowed it; in short, if that portion of the United States has, in less than half a century, as all admit, reached a point of improvement in wealth and arts which other times and people required ages to achieve, then, I say, I may with pride and confidence challenge the whole world, within the period of authentic history, to parallel the wonderful people which I have the honor, in part, to represent.

But, Mr. Speaker, sober reality and stubborn facts compel me to repress this exultation at our fancied superiority; modesty compels me to doubt whether truth places us so far above common mortality as this report has done. Facts, known facts, those unaccommodating things, that ruin so many beautiful inventions of fertile and ingenious minds, are constantly thrusting themselves before, and in the way of, the figures and philosophy of the gentleman who has labored in this report to push by them, and drive over them, to reach his favorite conclusions. You will observe, Mr. Speaker, that we are told of the "treasures other than those of the United States," into which this enormous tribute of three hundred and fifty millions has been poured. In the same connexion you hear of the "princely establishments" that have been reared up and sustained by it. The "princely establishments" are in the Northern manufacturing States. The "princes" to whom the tribute is paid are the people of this happy, favored region. Where, sir, are the poor oppressed tributaries, according to this report? Why, sir, in that sinking, ruined, wasted wilderness, the West!

The author of this report, under the influence of a too fervid imagination, has spurned the shackles and broken through the embarrassments arising from facts connected with the scheme of his theory. He represents the Northern manufacturing States as another imperial Rome, seated on her seven hills, rioting in the luxuries of the despoiled and impoverished South, her treasures bursting with the enormous wealth poured into them from the ravaged and desolated provinces of the West. Manufacturing is pictured as the finger of Midas, turning every thing it touches into gold, while it would seem that growing grain and planting cotton brought only taxation without equivalent, poverty and unrequited toil. Sir, if all this were true, what would follow? The people of this country, however they may be excelled by other nations in the walks of letters and the polite arts, are known to be shrewd and well-informed touching their own pecuniary interests. Such a people would be found rushing into the manufacturing districts, to reap harvests of wealth, and wallow in monopolies that drained every other portion of the Union to swell their accumulation. Such a people would be found to shun, as a land of pestilence and death, the agricultural region, where nothing awaited them but taxation, and consequent poverty. Sir, I regret that fact and the truths of history compel me to spoil the beautiful theories and exact calculations of this admirable report; but, sir, truth, however unwelcome, will be found, at last, the safest guide, in wandering through the labyrinths of speculation and theory. What, sir, is the fact? Why, for thirty years the tide of emigration has been from this very land of wealth, and not to it. The exodus has been from the land of promise, to the house of bondage. The shrewd Yankees have been flying from wealth, and ease, and monopoly, in their own country, to this very oppressed grain and cotton raising region of the West, seeking taxation, oppression, and want! For these last three years, as every American (except the authors of this report) well knows, population from the Northern States has been plunging its way through the ice of the Northern lakes, and bursting over the mountains, till the roads and rivers are literally choked with its masses. Where are these colonists going? To the West, to raise grain, and be taxed! To the Southwest, to grow cotton, and become poor! Such is the reasoning of the report. Now, I beg to know whether it is not taxing our good nature quite too far to ask us to believe, and act upon, ingenious theories, and long columns of figures, standing, as they do, opposed to facts, admitted, known, and understood, by every man in this Union over twenty-one years of age. To come to the conclusion at which the report has arrived, we are required to admit that man is blind to and careless of his own personal advantage. Nay, more: the authors of this report require you to deny to our American race the common instinct of all animal creation. The philosophy of this report teaches that man shuns ease, and desires toil; that he hates pleasure, and loves pain; that he eschews wealth, and courts poverty; that he flies from power, and seeks subjection. All this jumble of contradictions we are required to admit as self-evident truths, simply to explain existing facts in a way not to contradict this erudite treatise on trade and finance.

Mr. Speaker, I know it is impudent to obtrude our crude notions upon those to whom, from their position, we are taught to look for the lessons of wisdom; but I hope I may be allowed to inquire of the majority of the "Ways and Means," whether it had not been better had they reviewed slightly their philosophical reading, before they sat down to the arduous task of writing the production now before us. Had they turned to the pages of Bacon, with which I am sure they must be familiar, they would have found a maxim which, since the days of the great author of the "inductive philosophy," has never been disregarded. I think, if my memory is not at fault, it teaches that in all our researches after truth we must reason "ex præconcessis aut ex præcognitis." For the benefit of my unlettered Western friends, I am bound to render myself intelligible, by giving it in their own mother tongue. I will not be responsible for accuracy, but I am sure I shall not mistake the substance. The rule simply requires us always to reason from facts previously admitted, or previously known to exist.

Had this rule been observed, the authors of this report might have remembered that the oppressive tax on the cotton grower, paid in the shape of duties, was in some measure repaid him by a market for 350,000 bales of his cotton in this country every year, which market he could not have without the tax. It might have occurred to them, that the grower of grain, who paid his proportion of the duty on protected articles, was not so badly off, since he found in those "princely establishments" spoken of a market for his flour, pork, and beef, which, without these establishments furnishing a market, might have rotted on his hands. They might have thought the immense emigration to and vast improvements of the West were facts worth attention, in ascertaining whether that West was oppressed by the tariff, in a way too grievous to be borne. Far be it from me to assert, sir, that these facts would have puzzled the gentlemen; I only mean to say, sir, that vulgar and coarse minds would have been better satisfied with the report had some notice been taken of them.

Before I take leave of the subject, I wish to notice a few other difficulties which oppose the consideration of this bill at this time, and which spring from a source that will not be disregarded by the majority of this House. It will be seen that the bill proposes a reduction of our income, within the next eighteen months, of seven millions. A very considerable portion of this reduction falls on the receipts of the present year. The question I ask here is this: Can the Treasury bear this curtailment of its resources now? To answer this I appeal to an authority which for these last two years has never been questioned or doubted by the gentlemen who present this bill to the House. I allude to the annual report of the Secretary of the Treasury, made on the 6th of December last.

The receipts into the Treasury, from all sources, during 1837, are estimated at $24,000,000. I quote the very language of the report. Gentlemen will find I am right by reference to Document No. 2 of this session, page 4. After enumerating the various sources (such as customs, public lands, &c.) from which this amount is derived, the Secretary proceeds to compute the amount of expenditures for the present year. I shall give his own language, from the same document, page 5:

"The expenditures for all objects, ordinary and extraordinary, in 1837, including the contingent of only $1,000,000 for usual excesses in appropriations, beyond the estimates, are computed at $66,755,831, provided the unexpended appropriation at the end of this and the next year remain about equal."

Here gentlemen will see that, instead of reducing the revenue down to the wants of the Government, our income, from all sources, in 1837, falls short of our expenditures, as estimated, nearly $3,000,000. If the Secretary is right, (and will the gentlemen of the majority be so bold as to say he is wrong?) then the effort should be to increase the taxes to raise the revenue up to the actual wants of the Government. And, sir, if it were not for the five millions, which are kept in reserve for extraordinary demands on the Treasury by the deposit bill of last year, according to the calculations of Mr. Woodbury, we should be compelled now to increase the duties on foreign merchandise during the present year, or borrow money to meet the demands on the Treasury. Let us see what the Secretary further says on page 5 of the same report. I again quote his own words:

"From these calculations it will be seen that, if the outstanding appropriations unexpended at the close of 1837 be as large as at the close of 1836, and the other expenditures should agree with the above estimates, they would exceed the computed revenue accruing from all sources nearly $3,000,000, or sufficient to absorb more than half of that part of the present surplus which is not to be deposited with the several States. But if these outstanding appropriations at the close of 1837 should be much less than those in 1836, as is probable; or should the accruing receipts be much less, or the appropriations made for 1837 be much larger than the estimates, a call will become necessary for a portion of the surplus deposited with the States, though it will not probably become necessary, except in one of those events."

In the extract I have read, the Secretary has quite distinctly told us that the probability is, we shall not only absorb all the accruing revenue, and the five millions not deposited with the States, by the expenditures of 1837, but that the States will be called on to repay a portion of the money deposited with them, to meet the wants of the Government during the present year. How, sir, does the policy of reducing the revenue, as proposed in this bill, agree with this state of things? Pass the bill, sir, and in eighteen months, it is said, you will save in the pockets of the people seven millions, which would otherwise be drawn from them by the laws now in force. And, in the same time, if you place any confidence in the Secretary of the Treasury, you will be compelled to take from the people of the States (who are to have the use of the money deposited with them) an equal amount, if not more. What a miserable piece of bungling jugglery would this be! You simply take seven millions out of one pocket of the people and put it into the other, and gravely tell them you have saved to them seven millions of money by the process. Sir, the people of the States are not to be thus deceived. Let them look to this measure and its sure results. It is designed to bring about a state of things which will compel a call on them for the surplus revenue deposited with them, and which I am happy to see their Legislatures are using to the general advantage of their constituents.

But it is possible the friends of the Secretary will tell me his conjectures and calculations are not to be relied on. Shall I receive that answer from the gentlemen composing the majority here? Whose authority is it that is thus to be contemned? The very man whose behests have been laws to the Committee of Ways and Means ever since I have had the honor to be one of them. Sir, I have observed that it has been thought by that committee not only unwise, but even contumacious, factious, rebellious, to oppose any demand or to doubt any view taken by the Secretary of the Treasury. Nay, sir, I have thought sometimes that his friends on that committee considered it conclusive evidence of essential vulgarity; it was proof with them that a man had not seen "good society," if he presumed to question the propriety of any estimate or any requisition coming from that high and responsible source. So prevalent were these opinions, that I fear I have sometimes yielded my assent to appropriations, merely to preserve my character for "gentility" with the "haut ton," who compose the majority here, as they do in the committee of which I am a member. How is it, then, that we are now to dismiss all regard to the suggestions of this officer? Has not the President certified to you that he has discharged his duty with great ability and great fidelity? Do we not hear his friends every where extolling him to the skies for a prodigy of financial wisdom? Did not the President select him for his great and comprehensive knowledge of that most perplexing of all sciences—political economy; for his large and accurate acquaintance with the channels of trade and the sources of national wealth? Surely no one of the majority will doubt this. Now, sir, what respect is paid to his opinions, his "official opinions," by the bill and report on your table? True, it cannot be denied, for the President has said it is so, that he has discharged his duty with fidelity. Is it not unkind, then, in his own friends, his "ministering servants of the" Ways and Means, to treat his labors with such cruel indifference? See him day and night, watching the various currents of trade, that bring wealth to the people and revenue to the Treasury; sacrificing his ease and health to those "thoughts which waste the marrow and consume the brain;" year after year denying himself, with stoical fortitude, the gaieties of this most refined and fashionable city, brooding with ceaseless and anxious care over the Treasury, if not the treasure; he sits like "sad Prometheus fastened to his rock." And now, sir, as if they were determined that this Titan of the Treasury should realize the fate of his prototype of old, his ancient friends, it seems, by some magical change, turn tormentors, and are prepared to thrust their vulture-beaks into his liver, and, with remorseless voracity, devour his flesh, without ever terminating his pain. Sir, to drop figure, and speak in plain prosaic English, this bill asks you to treat every opinion of the present Secretary as stupid nonsense, and take as infallible truth the conjectures of this report in their stead. I ask the friends of the Secretary if they are prepared for this; if not, they will vote with me to postpone the bill.

Let it be remembered that the Secretary of the Treasury, whose views are diametrically opposed to the passage of any law looking to a reduction of the revenue, has given his opinions only a month ago. Surely he has not changed all his notions respecting our probable receipts in 1837 since he published his last report. I should be glad if my colleague, [Mr. HAMEN,] who told us the other day "he had lately been behind the curtain," would inform us whether, amongst other precious secrets, he had heard any thing of a total change of the Secretary's opinions on this subject, within the last few weeks.

Mr. Speaker, if the gentlemen who have brought forward this measure have emancipated themselves from all respect for the opinions and recommendations of your chief of finance—a respect bordering heretofore on absolute submission to his will, a little attention to documents emanating from a quarter still more venerated will exhibit them in an attitude of still more exalted independence. They are, however, (if I may be pardoned a conjecture so uncharitable,) scarcely entitled to a position so enviable as that of self-relying and self-resolved freedom of action. Something of the dross of selfishness, unhappily for poor humanity, mingles in the composition of the purest motives, and stains the glory of the most sublime achievements. The committee have, I fear, betrayed something too much of a quality, or, to speak phrenologically, an organ, of combativeness. They have not only spurned all the trammels of precedent, and despised all the opinions of the Secretary of the Treasury, but determined that paradox should, in themselves at least, have the merit of originality. They have set at naught, nay, scorned, the solemn injunctions of the President himself. Thus, they may be said to stand "alone in their glory." Sir, we have heard much of General Jackson's system of administration. If any meaning is to be attached to this word "system," which can stand against the arbitrary dictation of party, it will be admitted that it implies a plan which comprehends an order of proceeding by principles extending over the time, at least, of a presidential term. In this view, we can at once see how great principles are as true and applicable in practice in 1837 as they were in 1836. This being admitted, let us see how the bill and report now before us harmonize with the doctrines on the same subject, expressed in strong and earnest advice to Congress, in the President's message a year ago. I quote the entire passage from the message of 1836:

"Should Congress make new appropriations, in conformity with the estimates which will be submitted from the proper departments, amounting to about twenty-four millions, still the available surplus, at the close of the next year, after deducting all unexpended appropriations, will probably not be less than six millions. This sum can, in my judgment, be now usefully applied to proposed improvements in our navy yards, and to new national works, which are not enumerated in the present estimates, or to the more rapid completion of those already begun. Either would be constitutional and useful, and would render unnecessary any attempt, in our present peculiar condition, to divide the surplus revenue, or to reduce it any faster than will be effected by the existing laws. In any event, as the annual report from the Secretary of the Treasury will enter into details showing the probability of some decrease in the revenue during the next seven years, and a very considerable deduction in 1842, it is not recommended that Congress should undertake to modify the present tariff, so as to disturb the principles on which the compromise act was passed. Taxation on some of the articles of general consumption which are not in competition with our own productions may be, no doubt, so diminished as to lessen, to some extent, the source of this revenue; and the same object can also be assisted by more liberal provisions for the subjects of public defence, which, in the present state of our prosperity and wealth, may be expected to engage your attention. If, however, after satisfying all the demands which can arise from these sources, the unexpended balance in the Treasury should still continue to increase, it would be better to bear with the evil until the great changes contemplated in our tariff laws have occurred, and shall enable us to revise the system with that care and circumspection which are due to so delicate and important a subject."

Here gentlemen will perceive that the bill and report are at war with the President's opinion, solemnly expressed, on the same subject. Mark, however, the terms employed to designate the act of 1833: he calls it the "compromise act." As he anticipates a considerable reduction in our revenue during the next seven years, and especially in 1842, he warns us "not to disturb the principles on which the compromise act of 1833 was passed." Spoken like a man sensible of the obligations of legislative and public faith! Sentiments worthy the Chief Magistrate of a nation governed by law, whose duty it is to see the obligations of law faithfully observed! He speaks familiarly of the "principles" upon which the compromise act was passed. What does he mean by the "principles" of that act? Nothing else than these mutual stipulations by the great contending parties to that compact, providing for a stable, fixed rate of duties, which should remain, as the act itself expresses it, till June, 1842. The bill disregards the principles, or rather violates and destroys the principles, on which the compromise act was passed. The report, instead of anticipating a reduction of revenue by the laws now in force, goes about facilitating that reduction by legislating in a way contrary to the whole tenor of the President's opinion which I have quoted. Sir, I call on the chairman of the Ways and Means to say when, before now, he has ventured on a system of policy not approved by the "speech from the throne;" I ask him why he did not bring forward this bill last year, when every possible expedient was resorted to to get rid of a surplus, which was about to go to the States, as it did go, under a law so odious to the Prince Regent, who is to mount the throne the 4th of the coming March? A bill reducing the revenue then would have saved the troubles and dangers of a deposit with the States. That was the time, if ever, to have urged its passage. Since the surplus has gone to the States, no reason exists for reduction. Do not gentlemen see that a most uncharitable view may plausibly be taken of their course? It will be said, that as the President had forbidden you to disturb the compromise, and at that time had a year of his reign remaining, in which his power of reward and punishment could be exerted, you then dare not incur his displeasure; but now, when only six weeks of that reign are left, to be spent in the languor of convalescence, or it may be in the agony of pain, you may treat the opinions of your old chief with contempt, relying on the sure protection of the Executive elect. Of the chairman of the Ways and Means, (whom, if I may not number among my friends, I cannot call my foe,) I fear it may be said that his eye has been so dazzled by the glitter of expected coronets, under the new reign, that he has lost sight of all regard for the principles and authority of that which is now almost numbered with the past. "High-reaching Buckingham grows circumspect." What a striking exhibition is here of the emptiness and vanity of earthly renown and mere human power! But yesterday, and, like the mighty first Cæsar, "the word of Andrew Jackson might have stood against the world," and now, "none so poor as to do him reverence." Deserted by all his old and faithful followers, abandoned by those adoring crowds of self-styled democrats, I alone, an obscure and derided aristocrat, from the far West, as our nomenclature has it, I alone stand by the desolate old man, vindicating his opinions, and stemming, as I best can, that torrent of contempt poured out by his own former friends, which is likely to pursue and overwhelm him in his retreat from the scene of his glory.

How are we to account for this singular event? Singular indeed it is, apparently, but really what was to be looked for. Politicians who belong to what I may denominate, for the sake of distinction, the school of idolatry, do not worship the setting, but always the rising sun. No sooner, therefore, do we see the level beams of the retiring hero's setting orb begin to melt into the twilight, than, as we might expect, the thick crowds turn wistfully to a dubious and uncertain dawn in an opposite quarter of the heavens. With characteristic fitfulness it now shoots a gleam of faint light above the horizon, and anon withdraws it from the sight. At last, "half concealed, half disclosed," it rises on the world, and hither the multitudes repair to "worship and adore."

Thus, and thus only, can we account, sir, for those eccentric movements and strange contradictions which crowd themselves into the annals of the little and great aspirants after the peri-hable honors of this world; and this bill we are to receive as the first offering upon the altars erected to our new divinity. It is in this way our new sovereign will signalize the beginning of his reign. He will destroy, in the first year, 300 millions of property, all for the good of his loving subjects; and, with the blessing of God, which may be most reasonably expected to attend so beneficent a work, proceeding at this rate, he will succeed, in his reign of four years, in destroying twelve hundred millions of the nation's property. Thus will our excellent democratic Government enable our people to feel the force of that consoling declaration of Scripture, "Blessed are the poor."

Mr. Speaker, I should be happy to spare myself the pain which it always gives me to recur to former transactions in a way likely to excite unpleasant feelings; but I have the misfortune to differ with the majority of a committee of which I am a member: I am, therefore, compelled in self-defence to give every reason in my power for the course my conscience impels me to pursue.

The House are already apprized that the bill on the table presupposes a surplus of revenue as certain to accrue within the next eighteen months. The existence of this surplus is the evil the bill is intended to prevent. Whether this apprehended surplus will accrue is matter of opinion. I wish, then, to present another, and only one other, document, to show the reliance to be placed upon the opinions of that very majority of the Ways and Means, who now require us, on the faith of their opinion and conjecture merely, to pass this bill. Many gentlemen will remember that various projects for the disposition of the surplus revenue were referred to this same committee, composed of the same persons last year which now compose it. On the 1st of July, 1836, just before the close of the last session, and only about six months ago, a report was made, from which I propose to read an extract. It will be seen by this extract what were the opinions of the committee then, as to any surplus which might possibly come into the Treasury, and also their prognostics as to the probability of such an event happening at all.

After disposing of a variety of topics, and reviewing our past history, as usual, complaining with becoming indignation of bad currency in England and America, and deploring the existence of an evil spirit of speculation, notwithstanding the late death of the United States Bank, the report concludes as follows:

"Our revenue from customs and public lands, after 1837, is not likely to exceed the expenditures of Government. It is, therefore, important that, whatever surplus we may have in the mean time, whether deposited with the local banks or in the State treasuries, as is proposed after the 1st of January next, should be preserved, to be applied to the extraordinary purposes we have been compelled to provide for during this session, and for similar expenditures, which, in the present state of our Indian relations, may again become necessary. On the balance in the Treasury on the 1st of January next, and the revenue which may be received in 1837, there will be charged, in addition to the current expenditures of that year, and all extraordinary demands that may occur, probably near fifteen millions for appropriations authorized at the present session, making the claims upon the Treasury in the next year greater than in the present, while the revenue of 1837 will be considerably less than that of 1836, and leaving the surplus at the close of that year much diminished. As our income will not probably then exceed our current expenditures, we must rely entirely upon what surplus we may have to defray all expenses which may become necessary in extinguishing Indian titles to lands, removing the tribes beyond the Mississippi, and for other subjects of expenditure of an extraordinary character."

I beg the House to notice with what oracular gravity the prophets then uttered their predictions. "Our revenue from customs and public lands, after 1837, is not likely to exceed the expenditures of Government." We are then kindly, but still peremptorily, admonished to husband our surplus, if any, to meet those exigencies which every wise and considerate man should always be prepared to expect in human concerns. Again: at the close we are thus addressed: "As our income will not probably then exceed our current expenditures, we must rely entirely upon what surplus we may have to defray all the expenses which may become necessary in extinguishing Indian titles to land," &c. So spake the prophets six months since. And now, up jumps the chairman of the Ways and Means, "modest as Morning when she eyes the youthful Phœbus," and full of the same inspiration that burned in the bosom of the seer in July last, and, in the same solemn prophetic tones, he tells us our income will exceed our expenditures. Now we are admonished not to husband any surplus we may have, but to reduce the revenue by seven millions in the next year and a half, so that no surplus whatever shall remain.

Surplus Revenue.

Sir, when I see with what ruthless hand the committee has torn to pieces every shred of character for either ability or fidelity of the Secretary of the Treasury, and how with the same destructive appetency they have trampled down the authority of the President himself; and, lastly, when I see with what ridiculous gravity these two reports of the same committee, differing only six months in their ages, contradict each other, I hope the gentlemen will pardon the degrading analogy, but really I can think of nothing like them but the celebrated "cats of Kilkenny;" they have at last literally swallowed each other. Sir, I have done with this subject. I know I have detained the House already too long; for this I must find an apology in the fact that I had not the most distant thought of addressing the House on this subject till the afternoon of yesterday. Without further time for arrangement of topics, I could not hope to preserve that order which is so favorable to brevity as well as perspicuity. Let me again implore the House to put this subject at once at rest. The worst evil that can come is a surplus of a few millions; and even this the highest officer in the Government connected with your financial system tells you is impossible. But if it should occur, send it, as you have done before, to the States, where it can be used as well as kept. If this surplus is an evil, in that way you can rid yourselves of it as easily as the shipwrecked apostle shook off the serpent that fastened upon his hand. At all events, let your people rest one year from your miserable experiments. Let your former blunders teach you some caution. In your attempt to bring about a gold currency you have flooded the land with bank notes. In destroying the United States Bank monopoly you have raised up a greater monopoly in public lands. Now you are to try the experiment of breaking down what are called in this report the "princely establishments of the North." Sir, you will not, cannot, at least now, effect this last and most cruel experiment. Let us then put this bill quietly to sleep somewhere; let it rest in peace till 1842; then, perhaps, it may reappear amongst us under other auspices, and with better claims to our regard.

When Mr. CORWIN had taken his seat,

Mr. CUSHMAN rose and addressed the Chair as follows:

Mr. Speaker: The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LAWRENCE] has asked, in a very strong and emphatic manner, whether there is any member from New Hampshire, as well as from some other States in New England, who will rise in his place, and declare himself to be in favor of the principles contained in the report of the Committee of Ways and Means, relative to a modification of the "tariff," so as to bring the revenue down to the actual wants of the Government. At a time like the present, when, by a wise and judicious administration of the General Government for the last eight years, the public debt has been entirely extinguished, a surplus revenue of more than forty millions has been accumulated, it appears to me that the sentiments contained in that report are such as ought at once to be responded to by every true-hearted American. That the principles contained in that report are the sentiments of a great majority of the people of New Hampshire, I have not the least doubt.

Yes, sir, I think that I should do my constituents great injustice, should I neglect to declare here in my place, and on this occasion, that their opinion is, that this reform should have been completed at the commencement of the last session of Congress. I am wholly ignorant of their wants, if their wishes and desires are not in favor of reducing the revenue at once to the wants of an economical Government, and for limiting the sales of the public lands also to actual settlers. A large majority of that people believe that government is instituted for the general good of the whole community, and that the Government should carry on its operations upon the principles of a close and rigid economy. That no more money should be abstracted from the pockets of the people than what may be necessary for the support of the Government upon those principles. Consequently, they are opposed to a high tariff for the purpose of raising money to be expended under the superintendence of the General Government, in constructing railroads and canals, or any other internal improvements, which fall within the limits of what has been denominated the great American system. In a word, they believe that they have capacity to manage their own property in their own way, and that they ought to have the privilege of so doing, excepting so far as they are constitutionally bound to contribute to the support of the Government.

This privilege they would always enjoy without molestation, were it not for a few individuals in our country, who seem to think that they are entitled to the peculiar care and protection of the Government. But, sir, this assumption is not well founded. The constitution of the United States gives equal rights and equal privileges to the whole American people. It was upon this basis the Government was founded; and it is this fact that gives so much harmony and consistency to the whole system. It is this equality of rights which has thus far, and which I hope and trust always will, bind the people so closely to the republican institutions of our country, and to the Union of the States. I believe that the foregoing sentiments are in perfect accordance with the opinion of the great apostle of democracy, (Mr. Jefferson,) notwithstanding the manufacturers, both in this House and elsewhere, quote him as an authority for giving encouragement and protection to domestic manufactures. That Mr. Jefferson was in favor of encouraging domestic manufactures I readily grant; but that he was in favor of giving them any exclusive advantages over other branches of industry I deny. And it would seem, also, that those who have been in the habit of quoting that venerable gentleman—that distinguished patriot and statesman—as an infallible authority upon this subject, suppose that he was in favor of the system as it is now pursued in this country, of forming manufacturing towns and cities like unto those of Birmingham and Manchester. But, sir, if gentlemen will only compare Mr. Jefferson's opinion upon this subject with that which was uttered on a different occasion, and a different subject, they must be convinced that he alluded to a very different system of conducting domestic manufactures from the one which has been pursued in this country. My opinion is, that he alluded to those which should be literally domestic; to those, and those only, which should be carried on around the domestic fireside. In that case, the natural alliance between agriculture and manufactures would have remained unbroken, and consequently the conflicting interests which now prevail would never have been heard of in our halls of legislation.

There, sir, the husbandman, with the male portion of his family, is employed in growing the flax and the wool, while the good housewife, with her daughters, are engaged at the spinning-wheel and the loom, manufacturing wearing apparel sufficient for the wardrobe of each member of the family. This was the system of domestic manufactures to which that wise and patriotic statesman alluded. The other supposition would make him contradict himself, wherein he compares great cities to great sores upon the body politic. How much better the family system would be to the country than the other I shall not now stop to inquire. But I think that every candid and impartial mind will admit that it would be of infinitely more service to the country to raise up a hardy, intelligent, and virtuous race of agriculturists, and housewife economists, than a sickly and feeble race of operatives.

It is a fact, however, that the manufactories in this country, especially in the Eastern States, have been multiplied, one after another, upon almost every waterfall, till the wild and uninhabited deserts have been transformed into populous manufacturing cities. And those capitalists who have invested their funds in those great and expensive establishments have thought, and I doubt not sincerely thought, that they were entitled to some exclusive rights and privileges. Hence they have, from time to time, with great pertinacity, urged their claims upon the consideration of Congress, to grant them protection by excessive and onerous duties upon foreign importations. These solicitations have not been disregarded; but, on the other hand, Congress has, in compliance with the importunities of a few capitalists, levied upon the indispensable necessities of life the most unrighteous and oppressive duties. With this oppressive system of taxation, however, the people have borne without a murmur until the United States debt was entirely extinguished.

This has been accomplished, and a surplus revenue of more than forty millions having been accumulated, what could be more reasonable or natural than an expectation on the part of the people that Congress would forthwith relieve them from an oppressive system of taxation? Not only oppressive, but unjust and unconstitutional. They know very well that the United States do not want the money, because the General Government has already been obliged to acknowledge her incompetency to keep what she now has. They believe, also, that the time has arrived when even the manufacturer, as avaricious as he may be, must admit that he needs not the aid of the Government to enable him to carry forward his operations. And the cotton manufacturer readily grants that he can successfully compete with the whole world, save in the printed or stamped fabrics.

I have no doubt that the time has arrived when the woollen manufacturer ought to make the same acknowledgment. I believe that it is universally acknowledged, by machinists of the first reputation, that the machinery used in our manufactories has been carried to much greater perfection in this country than in Europe. And, although the laborer commands more wages here than in Europe, (which I hope will always be the case,) yet, owing to the difference in the labor-saving machinery, as well as to the fact that our operatives perform much more labor in the same given period of time than they do in Great Britain, make their aggregate expense about the same to the British manufacturer that it is to the American. I do not vouch for the truth of the above facts, yet I am free to confess that I most firmly believe their truth; and the reason that I believe them so is, because they have been communicated to me by those who had the means of knowledge, and by those in whose statements I have perfect confidence.

Is it not a fact that the great body of the American people are now paying, and for years past have been compelled to pay, much more for coarse woollens than they ought to pay? Is it not a fact also that broadcloths are selling in the market for four, five, and six dollars per yard, the actual cost of which does not exceed one dollar and a quarter? If the above facts be true, then it is very evident that our manufacturers are receiving a most enormous interest for the capital which they have invested. I trust, therefore, that Congress will no longer tax the many for the benefit of the few.

Another very important question, sir, has been propounded by the gentleman from Massachusetts, which ought to receive a brief reply. The gentleman has asked, with much warmth, and with strong emphasis, whether there is a concert of action upon this subject in the administration party of this House. I trust in God that there is a concert of action upon this all-important measure by the administration party in this House and out of this House. Not, sir, that the friends of the administration, excepting so far as the honorable Committee of Ways and Means may be concerned, have compared mind with mind upon this subject; yet I hope and trust that there is a concert of action, growing out of a common political faith, which will enable the majority of this House now to perform what should have been done during the last session of Congress. Whether there be a concert of action here or not, one thing is certain: that there is a concert of action among the people, which will, in due time, force its way hither, and produce a concert of action here, which will relieve them from their oppressive burdens.

Is it from a belief that there is a concert of action in the administration party of this House, or is it from a conscious conviction, on the part of the opposition, that the tariff ought to be reduced, that makes them so sensitive about touching what they are pleased to call the compromise act? We are implored again and again not to disturb this act, as it would be a breach of faith; that it would be an act of injustice to the manufacturer. I would be the last man to disturb any legislative act, or to impair in the slightest degree any article of compact, so long as it shall be for the public good not to do so. But, sir, when the public good requires the repeal, alteration, or modification, of any act of legislation, either of a public or a private character, I am prepared to act forthwith. Unless this is done, the enactments of legislative assemblies will become the engines of tyranny, oppression, and injustice, instead of being a blessing to the country, and the purposes of legislation be defeated.

It is said, however, that the tariff act of 1833 was the result of compromise relative to several conflicting interests of the country, therefore it ought not to receive any modification until the time therein mentioned shall have expired. Almost all enactments, to a greater or less extent, are the result of compromise, and should not be disturbed so long as they shall promote the general welfare of the people. But, I repeat, sir, that when the public interest does require a repeal or modification of any law, whether public or private, it is the duty of the Legislature forthwith to correct all existing evils, so far as it may be in the power of legislation to effect that object. If these principles are correct, then no one should hesitate for a moment so to modify the tariff as shall reduce the revenue of the United States to the wants of the Government. Although it is denied by the gentleman from Massachusetts that there is now any surplus on hand, yet upon what principle of mathematics he comes to such a conclusion I cannot imagine. According to the evidence which I have received upon this subject, I again affirm there is a surplus revenue of more than forty millions now in deposit, subject to the draft of the United States.

Mr. Speaker, if gentlemen will take the trouble to look into the compromise act, as they please to term it, they will find that there is no such sanctity as they have attempted to cast around it. No, sir; but, on the contrary, they will find that it contains a clause which provides for the very state of affairs in which we find ourselves. This provision declares "that nothing herein contained shall be so construed as to prevent the passage, prior or subsequent to the said thirtieth day of June, one thousand eight hundred and forty-two, of any act or acts, from time to time, that may be necessary to detect, prevent, or punish, evasions of the duties or imposts imposed by law, or to prevent the passage of any act prior to the thirtieth day of June, eighteen hundred and forty-two, in the contingency either of excess or deficiency of revenue, so as to adjust the revenue to either of said contingencies."

H. of R.]

Surplus Revenue.

Yet, sir, notwithstanding the above-mentioned provisions, we are told that it would be sacrilege to touch the tariff. And the ostensible reason, which has been repeated again and again, why we must not modify the above-mentioned act, is, because it would be a breach of the public faith. But, sir, is this the cause why gentlemen are so extremely sensitive upon this subject, or is it because it may in some measure affect the interests of a few private individuals?

But, sir, supposing there had been a deficiency of public revenue to meet the expenses of the Government, what then would be the language of those gentlemen who are so very sensitive relative to the preservation of the public faith? Would it in that case be treason to disturb the compromise bill? No, sir; in such a crisis of affairs, if the friends of the administration did not come forward, by concert of action, to provide for the deficiency, we should be told that we were not only sacrificing the interests of the manufacturers of our country, but that we were sacrificing the country herself.

I readily grant that if there had been a deficiency of revenue to meet the wants of the Government, then the tariff ought to be revised immediately, and the duties so increased upon the importation of foreign merchandise as would at once supply that deficiency. And as there is a great surplus of public revenue, upon the same principle, I now here in my place, on behalf of the people of my own State, as well as for the whole country, demand a modification of the tariff, so that the revenue of the United States may be brought to the wants of the Government. I hope that the voice of the people, through their representatives upon this floor, may be heard, and their expectations forthwith gratified. For, sir, I am firmly persuaded that, unless there is a modification of the tariff this session, so as to relieve the people from the present unjust, unrighteous, and oppressive taxation of the necessities of life—their daily consumptions—that they will petition the President to assemble a new Congress.

But, sir, if the friends of the administration, as well as of the country, will do their duty, a modification of the tariff and the limitation of the sale of the public lands may be effected the present session of Congress; and unless the rights of the great body of the people are to be yielded up to the importunities of a few interested individuals, this desirable object will be accomplished. I say a few individuals, for that portion of our fellow-citizens who have invested their surplus capital in domestic manufactures compose only a fraction of one eighth of the business men of the country. Yes, sir, seven eighths of the business men of our country are agriculturists—the cultivators of the soil—the actual producers of the indispensable necessities of life. And although those who have an invested interest in domestic manufactures, as well as the operatives, are entitled to great respect, yet how much better it would be for the country to raise up a hardy, industrious, intelligent, and virtuous race of yeomanry, than a pale and sickly race of operatives, which are collected together in our manufacturing cities.

It does appear to me that, if any class of people on earth is entitled to exclusive privileges, it is those who are engaged in husbandry. Yet this valuable class of our fellow-citizens, which, as I have before observed, compose the country, have claimed no such distinction. As a justification for the clamor which the manufacturers have constantly made at the doors of the National Legislature, they have even again and again asserted that the agriculturists have been protected in their great and important interests, by a duty imposed upon the importation of foreign grains. But, without dwelling longer upon this point, I will only ask the attention of the House, as well as the country, to the following astounding facts, contained in a statement from the Treasury Department, wherein it will be seen that the duty on foreign grain imported into the United States annually, from 1826 to 1835, inclusive, has virtually been no protection to the agriculturist. Let the statement speak for itself:

In the year 1826,	on wheat	$862 00,	on oats	$95 80
Do 1828,	do	179 25,	do	122 50
Do 1829,	do	68 75,	do	30 70
Do 1830,	do	117 50,	do	208 10
Do 1831,	do	218 75,	do	67 70
Do 1832,	do	267 75,	do	124 70
Do 1833,	do	486 25,	do	39 00
Do 1834,	do	300 50,	do	178 30
Do 1835,	do	62,626 25,	do	3,121 00

It is also mentioned, in the same communication from the Treasury Department, that "the amount of duties which accrued in 1836 have not been adjusted; but from the quantity imported, as far as ascertained, it is estimated that the duties on wheat will have amounted in that year to $125,000, and on oats to $15,000."

What an insult this, to this great and highly meritorious class of people! Here we perceive that, in a time of plenty, there is a duty of a few hundred dollars upon foreign grain, to protect the great agricultural interests of the United States; and, sir, in a time of comparative scarcity, what is the amount of duties upon the above description of foreign grains? Why, sir, the enormous sum of one hundred and forty thousand dollars! While the agriculturists are receiving this pitiful protection, they are paying a duty on salt alone, to say nothing of the enormous duties on iron and steel, and all the other necessities of life, of seven hundred thousand dollars. From the above table of duties it will appear that, in a time of plenty, the quantity of foreign grain imported into the United States is very limited, so that the assertion is virtually true, that it affords no protection to the agricultural interests of the country. I think they will grant that they need no protection, and that they desire none excepting that which is to be derived from an equitable system of laws, and the watchful care of a kind and merciful Providence.

It is said, however, by the advocates of the tariff, that if the farmer does not receive any benefit from the duty imposed upon the importation of foreign grain in a time of plenty, yet he feels its influence in a time of scarcity. But, sir, I believe that in a time of scarcity, of want, and of privation, the American agriculturist would spurn from him the suggestion of increasing his wealth at the expense of his unfortunate neighbor. Yes, sir, this class of people have too much generosity, humanity, and magnanimity, to take advantage of such a regulation, in order to enhance the price of their own grain to one whose crops have been providentially cut down by an untimely frost. No, sir; at such a time import as much foreign grain as you please, still the price of domestic bread stuffs will be high enough to satisfy every husbandman whose disposition is not corroded by avarice.

Mr. Speaker, much has been said, during the time this subject has been under discussion, of home industry. Is home industry entirely dependent upon those who are interested in domestic manufactures? Where is the agriculturist? Has he nothing to do in promoting home industry? Where is the merchant, who is carrying on an extensive and flourishing commerce? Ought he not to come in for a share of the praise for encouraging home industry? Where are all those who are engaged in the mechanic arts? Are they not also advocates for home industry? Does home industry depend upon collecting together three or four thousand females, to spin and weave in a factory? Could not these same females be just as industrious at the paternal fireside as when huddled together in a manufacturing city? My belief is that they could, and that it would ultimately be much more conducive to their own welfare if they would remain under the watchful eye of an affectionate mother, and in her presence, and under her direction, attend to domestic manufactures in the family circle.

Sir, the cupidity of the salt manufacturer of New York, the owner of coal mines in Pennsylvania, the cotton growers of the South and the West, the cultivator of hemp in Kentucky, and the sugar manufacturer of Louisiana, have all been entreated to come up to the rescue of the woollen manufacturer of New England. I would also come to their rescue, if I could do it upon just and constitutional principles; but just and equitable principles, as well as the provisions of the constitution, forbid it. Before this can be done, the constitution must be modified, so as to give authority to Congress to distribute the surplus revenue; and the order of nature must be entirely changed, so that that which is now unjust shall become just. For this reason, I think there will be no response from either of the States which have been mentioned. Although, by a reduction of the tariff, the salt and the sugar manufacturer, as well as the cotton and the hemp grower, and the owner of the coal mines, as above mentioned, may have the price of those articles thereby reduced, yet a moment's reflection will teach them that, for all these reductions, they will be doubly compensated by a reduction in their own family expenditures.

But, sir, the people of those States, as well as their representatives upon this floor, are, I trust, too firmly attached to the principles of justice and the constitution to be swerved from the path of duty from any sinister motives. They will ask for what purpose duties upon the importation of foreign goods were imposed. And let me put this question to the friends of the administration—those who have been educated in the school of Jeffersonian democracy—for what purpose do you lay duties upon foreign importations? Your answer will be, "to pay the debts and provide for the common defence and welfare of the United States." The above paragraph embraces all the power which Congress possesses upon this subject. May lay taxes to pay the debts and provide for the common defence and general welfare of the country. Not to distribute among the States, nor to protect this, that, or the other, particular branch of industry, in which any portion of our people may be engaged.

Notwithstanding, however, the dominant political party of the United States believe that the powers of Congress are thus limited, yet there now is, and there always has been, ever since the adoption of the constitution, a large and powerful political party which pretend that Congress has power to distribute the people's money at will, and also to protect any branch of industry that it chooses to protect, and in any way and manner it chooses to do it. Supposing such a doctrine had been avowed when this instrument was laid before the several State conventions for ratification, what would have been the result of the deliberations of those conventions? Would the constitution of the United States have been adopted? No, sir, never. It would have been rejected as a tyrannical and oppressive form of government, fit only for the protection of a few monopolists. If Congress can tax the people for the protection of any number of individuals, or for distribution, then it may make a specific appropriation for the protection of a single individual.

To test this mode of construction, let an individual come up here and say to Congress that he has invested the whole of his capital in domestic manufactures; that owing to the great competition, both in this country and in Europe, he shall be ruined unless Congress will make him a specific appropriation, to aid him in contending with this competition. Is there a gentleman upon this floor who would dare to record his name in favor of such an appropriation? Not one. No, not one. How then, I ask, can the members of this House consent to prolong this onerous system of indirect taxation upon the people, to raise money which is not wanted, which is entirely useless, or worse than useless? One would be as much a violation of the constitution and the principles of justice as the other. I therefore entreat every member of this House who professes to be a literal constitutionalist, all who profess to belong to the democracy of the country, who have any regard for individual rights, to act in concert upon this great and important measure, and forthwith remove the evil which is preying upon the vitals of the people, and sapping the foundations of all our invaluable institutions. Yes, sir, I appeal to all the friends of equal rights and privileges to come forward in support of sound constitutional principles, and the cause of justice and humanity; to come forward with a determination that this session of Congress shall not close without a modification of the tariff.

Mr. GALBRAITH said that as he was anxious to have an opportunity of bestowing on the bill and report a deeper consideration than he had yet been able to give to them, and as he had no doubt that there were others similarly situated, he moved to postpone the further consideration of the subject until Tuesday next, and that the bill, report, and tabular statements, be printed.

Mr. MUHLBERG said he did not propose at this time to enter into the merits of the bill, but as it appeared to him that the discussion, if allowed to continue, would consume the whole balance of the session, without eliciting a final decision, he moved that the bill, report, and documents, be laid on the table, and that they be printed.

Mr. CALHOON, of Kentucky, moved a division of the question—first, on laying the bill, &c. on the table, and then on printing.

Mr. PATTON called for the yeas and nays on the motion of Mr. MUHLBERG; which were ordered.

Mr. CAMBRELENG was understood to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MUHLBERG] to withdraw his motion.

Mr. A. MANN said, that as this was a very important question—

[Cries of "order!" "order!"]

Mr. M. said he merely wished to make a motion, and when gentlemen had done calling him to order he would do so.

[Cries of "order!" "order!"]

Mr. M. said he wished to move a call of the House.

Mr. OWENS called for the yeas and nays on that motion; which were ordered, and were: Yeas 105, nays 91.

So a call of the House was ordered.

The Clerk proceeded to call the roll, but had not made much progress when, on motion of Mr. LANE, all further proceedings in the call were suspended.

Surplus Revenue.

[JAN. 13, 1837.]

The question then recurred on the motion to lay the bill and report on the table, and to print the same.

After some desultory conversation as to whether the motion to lay on the table and print was in order, which point, however, was not pressed—

Mr. VANDERPOEL moved that the House adjourn, and called for the yeas and nays; but subsequently withdrew the motion.

The question then recurring on the motion to lay on the table,

Mr. CAMBRELENG hoped that, before the question was taken, the bill would be read by its title.

Mr. C. was called to order.

Mr. McKEON inquired whether, before he gave his vote, he might not ask if he was not about to vote for a bill to reduce the revenue of the United States to the wants of the Government.

The CHAIR was understood to say that the gentleman from New York could not do so as matter of right.

Mr. WISE said he was not present when the bill was read, and he wished to know what the bill was on which he was about to vote.

The SPEAKER said the title of the bill was, "A bill to reduce the revenue of the United States to the wants of the Government."

Mr. WISE wished to see whether the contents of this bill corresponded with its title.

Mr. MANN objected; but the bill was again read.

And the question on the motion to lay the bill and report on the table was then taken, and decided in the negative, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, C. Allan, H. Allen, Anthony, Ashley, Bailey, Beaumont, Bell, Black, Bond, Borden, Briggs, Buchanan, J. Calhoun, W. B. Calhoun, G. Chambers, J. Chambers, Chetwood, Childs, Clark, Crane, Cushing, Darlington, Denny, Evans, Everett, Fowler, French, Galbraith, R. Garland, Granger, Grennell, H. Hall, Hard, Harlan, Harper, S. S. NAYS—Messrs. Ash, Barton, Bean, Boon, Bouldin, Bovee, Boyd, Brown, Burns, Bynum, Cambreleng, Campbell, Carr, Carter, Casey, Chaney, Chapman, Chapin, N. H. Claiborne, J. F. H. Shepperd, Shields, Shinn, Smith, Standefer, Taliaferro, Thomas, John Thomson, Waddy Thompson, Turrill, Vanderpoel, Ward, Webster, Weeks, L. Williams, Wise, Yell—117.

So the House determined that the bill should not be laid on the table.

Mr. HOLSEY said, that as his section of the country was interested in this subject, and as he wished to submit a few remarks to the House, he would now, the hour being late, move that the House adjourn.

Mr. H. withdrew his motion, on the suggestion of Mr. CAMBRELENG and moved that the bill, report, and documents, be printed; which motion prevailed.

After transacting some other business, The House adjourned.

FRIDAY, JANUARY 13.

SURPLUS REVENUE.

Mr. E. WHITTLESEY asked the indulgence of the House to postpone the further consideration of the bill to reduce the revenue of the United States to the wants of the Government, in order that reports of committees might be received. If this motion should prevail, Mr. W. said it was his design, after the committees had made their reports, to ask the House to take up and dispose of such private bills as could be disposed of in the course of the day, and as would elicit no debate.

Mr. JARVIS inquired how it was to be ascertained what bills would elicit debate, and what not.

Mr. WHITTLESEY said, when it was found that a bill was about to excite debate, a motion might be made for its postponement.

Mr. BELL said he did not wish to throw any obstacle in the way of the transaction of the business of the House, but he thought that the only way by which the general subjects before the House could be reached was by adhering to the ordinary course of proceeding. If the bill and report on the tariff stood in the way, let them be postponed; but let there be no partial action. He had no objection, if the friends of the bill desired it, to move that the further consideration of the bill be postponed until Wednesday or Thursday next, and that the bill, &c. be printed.

The SPEAKER said that there was already a motion pending for postponement until Tuesday next, submitted by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. GALBRAITH.] This was the first question now pending on the bill, and the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HOLSEY] would be entitled to the floor.

Mr. HOLSEY said he had no objection to a postponement.

Mr. CAMBRELENG was understood to say that he was very anxious to take up some of the appropriation bills in the early part of the week. It was not his intention, nor the intention of the Committee of Ways and Means, to arrest discussion on the tariff bill. He would suggest to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BELL] to move the further postponement of its consideration until Thursday next, and to make it the special order of the day.

Mr. LAWRENCE said that he had proposed to withdraw his motion for indefinite postponement, and to move that the bill be committed to a Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER said that that motion had heretofore been submitted, and was now pending.

Mr. LAWRENCE then withdrew his motion for indefinite postponement.

The SPEAKER said that the two pending motions would then be, a motion to postpone to Tuesday next, and a motion to commit. If a motion was made to postpone to a later day, that would take precedence. If the motion to postpone was withdrawn, the question would then recur on the motion to commit.

Mr. BELL then withdrew his motion to postpone to a day certain.

The SPEAKER said that the question would then recur on the motion to postpone until Tuesday next.

Imprisonment for Debt in the District of Columbia—Texas, &c.

[H. OF R.]

Mr. THOMAS moved to postpone until Monday week, with a view to give the House an opportunity to dispose of the grave and important question of the admission of Michigan into the Union.

Mr. ADAMS said he hoped the gentleman would name some other day than Monday, as that was the only day on which members had an opportunity to present their petitions.

Mr. THOMAS substituted Tuesday next.

Mr. JARVIS hoped the bill would be suffered to take the ordinary course. Let it be committed to a Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and then the House could take it up at any time they saw fit. He wanted no special orders, if they could be avoided.

The SPEAKER said, if the House rejected the motion to postpone, the motion to commit was next in order.

Mr. WARDWELL inquired if it was not necessary that the bill should be committed.

The SPEAKER reminded Mr. W. of his decision, made the other day, that the bill need not, as matter of necessity, be committed.

The question on the motion of Mr. THOMAS, to postpone the further consideration of the bill until Tuesday week, was taken, and lost.

And the question on the motion of Mr. GALBRAITH, to postpone until Tuesday next, was taken, and lost.

Mr. McKAY moved to postpone until Thursday next; which motion was also lost.

Mr. PARKER moved to commit the bill to the Committee on Manufactures.

The motion to commit to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, having precedence of Mr. PARKER's motion to commit to the Committee on Manufactures, was taken, and decided in the affirmative. So the bill was committed to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. SMITH, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported a resolution ordering ten thousand extra copies of the report of the Committee of Ways and Means, relating to the reduction of the tariff, to be printed for the use of the House.

The resolution, under the rule, would lie over one day.

Mr. SMITH moved its consideration at that time.

Mr. BELL inquired if it was in order to consider such a resolution then.

The CHAIR replied that it was, as it was a report from a committee.

Mr. LAWRENCE really hoped that objection would be withdrawn, for it was a most important document, and ought to be extensively circulated among the people.

Mr. BELL had made no objection, but only an inquiry on the point of order. No motion being made to consider, the resolution was read.

Mr. MANN, of New York, suggested a larger number, for that ordered would be inadequate to the wants of the members for their constituents. He moved that twenty thousand be printed.

Mr. DENNY. Why, that is enough to poison them!

Mr. CRAIG thought the original number proposed sufficient.

Mr. MANN would meet the views of gentlemen on both sides, and he therefore proposed fifteen thousand. Lost.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, moved to strike out ten thousand, and in insert five thousand. Lost.

Mr. BRIGGS moved to include the bill with the report, which was agreed to; and, so amended, the resolution was concurred in.

The remainder of the day was spent in the consideration of reports and private bills.

IMPRISONMENT FOR DEBT IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. ADAMS rose and said that, on the third day of last June, a resolution reported from the Committee for the District of Columbia had been adopted by the House, requesting the Secretary of State to ascertain and report to the House the number of persons imprisoned for debt since the year 1820, in the District of Columbia; the time during which they had been imprisoned; the amounts of their respective debts; the portions thereof which had been paid in consequence of their imprisonment; the expense to the creditors of maintaining them, &c. Mr. A. wished to inquire from the chairman of the Committee for the District of Columbia, or from some other member of it, whether there had been any report from the Secretary in answer to the resolution.

[It appeared, from a statement made by the Clerk of the House, and Mr. W. B. SHEPARD, that such a report had been made during the present session of Congress, that it had been placed in the hands of the official printer, but that, being very long, copies of it had not yet been furnished to the members.]

Mr. A. said his reason for making the inquiry was, that amongst the prisoners was one of his constituents. The individual was confined there during the last session, at the time this resolution was adopted. He was there still, for debt; and it was Mr. A's firm belief that he was there only for having been too zealous in the discharge of his duty as an officer of the Government, for debts vastly inferior in amount to what was due to him from the nation, if justice was done.

Mr. A. was anxious that the House should act on the resolution.

TEXAS.

Mr. PICKENS was desirous of some information from the Committee on Foreign Affairs in relation to the subject of Texas. He wished to inquire of the honorable chairman of that committee (whom he saw in his seat) if he could give the House some information when a report on the subject of the President's special message in relation to Texas might be expected from that committee, or if any report at all was to be made. He hoped the chairman would respond to his inquiry.

Mr. HOWARD (chairman of the committee) said he had no objection at all, and would reply cheerfully, so far as he knew, to the question propounded by the gentleman from South Carolina. The committee had been very industriously engaged in the consideration of that subject, and had held repeated meetings upon it. As yet, they had come to no conclusion. He could only repeat that the committee had lost no time in the investigation, for it had occupied their almost undivided attention since it had been referred to them, almost to the exclusion of every thing else.

Mr. PICKENS. Was he to understand that the committee had come to no conclusion whether they would report or not?

Mr. HOWARD. They had come to no conclusion whatever.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HARLAN asked the consent of the House at this time to submit a resolution that on Monday next the States should be called for petitions in reverse order.

[This resolution, if adopted, would entitle the new States to be first called upon.]

Objection having been made,

Mr. DAVIS moved a suspension of the rule.

Mr. ADAMS said he hoped that the rule would not be suspended. He hoped the House would understand what he presumed to be the object of the resolution; that was, to postpone the debate commenced on Monday last, and which was left in a state of suspense; one gentleman having begun a speech which he did not finish. The object of the resolution was to give that subject the go-by. He hoped the debate would be suffered to take its course.

And the question on the motion to suspend the rule was taken, and decided in the negative: Ayes 88, noes 46—two thirds not voting in the affirmative.

So the rule was not suspended.

Mr. LEWIS said the question had certainly not been understood in that part of the House, or the rule would have been suspended. He called for tellers.

The CHAIR said it was too late; the decision of the House having been announced.

Mr. BELL gave notice that he would renew his motion for leave to bring in a bill to secure the freedom of election. He had forborne to urge this subject on the consideration of the House, because he had expected that the resolution proposed by the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. C. ALLAN,] in relation to grants of the public lands to such States as had not heretofore received them, would be disposed of this morning. But if the House would persist in these abortive motions to suspend the rule for partial purposes, he should be compelled to press his motion. He would waive it now, if the House would resume the consideration of that resolution.

THE PUBLIC LANDS.

The House resumed the consideration of the resolution heretofore offered by Mr. ALLAN, of Kentucky, providing for grants of public lands to such States as had not heretofore received them, together with the amendments thereto pending.

Mr. LANE, who held the floor when the subject was last under consideration, resumed and concluded his remarks.

Mr. BELL said he rose more for the purpose of submitting a few remarks on the propriety of bringing this discussion to a close, than for any other purpose, although the subject was of great interest, and though he had himself been perfectly willing it should be sent to a committee. He thought, however, that the proposition was too narrow for the time at which it was brought forward; and he thought that the necessity of broader action must have become apparent to every man. If there was one question, above all others, on which prompt action was required, it was that of disposing permanently of the various questions which had arisen in relation to the public lands. If they were to be distributed in any degree, to any extent, let it be done. If it was not the sense of the country that this should be done, let Congress declare that sentiment by a vote which would give proof of its permanence.

The question of graduation, for instance, was intimately connected with this subject; but he did not consider even that of so much importance as that the question should be settled one way or another. He would give his vote at once in favor of the graduating system, provided the question could be settled permanently. Mr. B. then alluded to the question of pre-emption rights. Justice required that the inhabitants of the country should know what was to be our established policy; and that, if it was not intended to give these pre-emption rights, Congress should at once declare so. He regarded the permanent settlement of these questions, however, as of far less importance than the mode by which they should be settled. He was ready to reduce the price of public lands, if such should be the sense of the House. He believed it to be for the interest of the country that it should be done; and he should hereafter, at a proper season, have something to say on this topic. He would move to postpone the further consideration of the subject until this day fortnight, in order that the States might be called in their turns for resolutions; or, if any member would suggest it, he would move to lay the whole subject on the table.

Mr. BOND moved that the same be laid on the table.

Mr. C. ALLAN called for the yeas and nays on that motion; which were ordered.

Mr. HUNTSMAN inquired of the Chair whether, if the motion to lay on the table prevailed, the effect of that vote would be the final rejection of the resolution.

The SPEAKER said it would be in order to move to take up the subject at any time, when motions of similar import were in order.

Mr. C. ALLAN moved that the House proceed to the private orders of the day.

Mr. BELL hoped the subject would be disposed of now.

Mr. C. ALLAN objected; and the Speaker thereupon announced the private orders of the day, when several engrossed bills were taken up and passed.

N. AND L. DANA.

The bill to refund certain duties paid by Messrs. N. & L. Dana & Co., on salt destroyed by flood, coming up—

Mr. SMITH said he commended most sincerely the vigilance with which the honorable gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. C. JOHNSON] watched over the Treasury of the Government. He was sure, nevertheless, that the gentleman was no less ready than others to refund to individual claimants their honest dues, in cases where, upon full investigation, the Government is shown to be possessed of moneys that rightfully belong to individuals. I am most sensible, said Mr. S., of the impossibility that every member upon this floor should examine with a just scrutiny every claim that comes before us, so as to enable him to discriminate justly between their merits, and the principles which they respectively involve. If the honorable gentleman from Tennessee had thus scrutinized the claim now before the House, and ascertained carefully the distinction that exists between the principles it involves and the principles of the "fire bill" reported in favor of the New York city merchants, he would not have assimilated this bill to that, as being of precisely the same character, and as establishing a precedent by which millions of dollars would be drawn from the Treasury. Sir, said Mr. S., this bill, however it may be of a kindred character with the New York fire bill, is not dependent upon the same principles with that bill; and the passage of this bill will furnish no precedent for the passage of the other bill, of which the gentleman from Tennessee expresses so much apprehension. Whether there be in the other bill sufficient merit to justify its passage or not, it is not now the time to decide; nor do I now feel myself called upon to say whether I shall or shall not give that bill my support.

What, sir, is the character of the bill now before the House? It is to refund the duties paid upon a certain amount of salt imported by the claimants, and destroyed by a most extraordinary flood, on the night of the same day when it was landed upon the wharf. I beg leave to call the attention of the House to a candid consideration of the principles involved in this bill; for they are, as the gentleman from Tennessee has supposed, of much magnitude, and certainly of great interest to the mercantile interests of the country, as well as of interest to the Government; they merit the deliberate consideration of the House.

The principles adopted by the Committee of Ways and Means, in reporting this bill, are specifically stated in the report which I had the honor to make to the House upon it, and are as follows:

"That relief for the remission of duties upon goods destroyed by inevitable accident can be safely granted in those cases, and in those cases only—

"Where the goods were still in their original state as imported, and had not entered into the mass of commodities destined for the immediate consumption of the country.

"Where the circumstances of the loss are such as not only to excite no suspicion of fraud, but as expressly and directly to exclude the possibility of it.

"Where the loss could not have been covered by ordinary insurance, or guarded against by the caution and diligence of a vigilant and prudent man of business.

"Where the evidence to all these points is full, direct, unquestionable, and of the highest nature the case will permit."

Now, sir, I appeal to the deliberate judgment of this House to determine whether these principles are not founded in sound policy and substantial justice, both as they affect the Government and the mercantile community. Both are deeply interested in the judgment of Congress upon this subject, and justice towards the one must be measured by what is also justice towards the other. The case now before us, sir, comes pointedly and indisputably within both the letter and equity of these principles. The salt was destroyed while in its original state. The circumstances of its destruction are such as to exclude the possibility of fraud; it was landed under the inspection of the custom-house officers, and its destruction is testified by them, as also its amount. It was a loss that could not have been covered by ordinary insurance. No companies exist to take insurances of property against risks by flood upon the land; and no merchant or other person ever dreamed of seeking such an insurance. Such an insurance, against flood upon the land, would indeed imply of itself great negligence in regard to the place of storing the property, and be proof of its being an insecure and improper place. Sir, this property, as the proof in this case abundantly shows, was stored where no flood had ever been known to reach in fifty years past. It was a place of supposed security, and no vigilance would have anticipated the event which destroyed it. To all these points the proof is plenary, indisputable, and above the suspicion of fraud. Then, sir, I ask, is there a gentleman upon this floor who will controvert the justice of this claim, or contend that the duties thus paid ought not to be refunded?

Mr. Speaker, I am not one of those who feel themselves tied down to any set of principles, from mere regard for precedents. I, for one, care not whether a case has precedent in its support or not. I look at the principles believed to be involved in each case as it arises; and if these are such as commend themselves to my judgment, I will support the case, though a thousand precedents be arrayed against it; and so, on the contrary, if a case that exhibits precedents without number in its support comes not within my notions of just reasoning and sound principles, I will oppose and repudiate it. But, sir, I know there are gentlemen upon this floor who do place reliance on precedent, and who ask, for every new case that arises, if precedent exists to justify it. To such I will say, I have precedents enough in support of every principle involved by this claim to sustain and justify its allowance; and one precedent, in particular, will I furnish the House, where not only the abstract principle of this case, but every incidental circumstance of it, finds an astonishing similitude. History scarcely records two accidental and distant events so strangely alike as the one now before us and the one I will cite directly.

But, sir, I will begin with the earliest legislation of Congress upon this subject of remitting duties on imports destroyed. The principle recognised by Congress in many of them was that of remitting duties upon such articles as had been accidentally destroyed while in the shape of their original importation; in other words, on articles that had been destroyed before entering into the consumption of the country. This is substantially one of the principles adopted by the Committee of Ways and Means, in the report of the case now before us. This is founded on the supposition that the destruction of the article thus remitted upon will give place to a new importation into the country of a corresponding amount, upon which the Government will receive its quota of duties anew, and thus be indemnified for the remission. This is an equitable and an honest supposition. Surely it can never be the policy of the Government to speculate upon the misfortunes of its merchants or citizens. Sir, this principle alone is broad enough to cover the case, and to authorize the remission now proposed by the bill before the House.

But, sir, I go to the precedents of Congress. The first case I will cite is the first case definitely acted on by Congress—the case of Thomas Jenkins & Co., contained in ch. 47, art. 2, Laws of the United States, p. 110. The act provides:

"That the duties, amounting to $167 50, be remitted on a parcel of hemp, duck, ticklenburg, and molasses, the property of Thomas Jenkins & Co., merchants of the city of Hudson, in the State of New York, which were lost by fire in the brig Minerva, on her passage from New York to the city of Hudson, her port of delivery; and the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States is hereby authorized and directed to allow a credit on the bond or bonds executed by the said Thomas Jenkins & Co. for payment of the duties on the said goods. Approved June 14, 1790."

It is observable, Mr. Speaker, that this case embraces a principle of much broader extent than is recognised in either the circumstances of the case, or in the report of the case, now before the House. The property released from duty in Jenkins's case had made its port of entry, and was proceeding to its port of delivery, when the loss occurred; and the loss occurred from an exposure of the property, by the owners, to new risks, and to a risk that the property might and would have been protected against by ordinary care and vigilance on the part of the owners. It was an insurable risk—one that could have been foreseen, and calculated upon, and insured against. In the Dana case, before the committee, the loss arose from entirely different causes—from a flood of unexampled severity; from a cause which could not have been reasonably anticipated, nor calculated upon, nor insured against; from a risk which human foresight and experience could not have regarded as possible, and from a risk not ordinarily insurable. The evidence in the case is, that, "A little after midnight, a violent gale of wind commenced, which continued to blow until high water at noon next day, driving into the harbor an immense sea, and raising the tides higher than had been known for many years, covering the wharves and overflowing the lower stories of many buildings. By this tide, the store in which the salt was stored was moved from its foundation, and the whole of the salt washed away. The salt was landed under the inspection of the officers of the customs, who were witnesses to the loss, and certify to the facts."

The next case on record is a case exactly in point, so exactly that all the circumstances of the loss are identically the same with the one now before us. The article destroyed was salt; it was destroyed by flood, after being landed; it was destroyed by a flood of uncommon magnitude, and destroyed, too, on the night of the day when it was landed. The case of Dana & Co. is the same case throughout. It is wonderful how two occurrences of such exact similitude should take place. The report of the committee in this former case was made to the House of Representatives, July 24, 1790. It was duly considered by the House, and a bill moved accordingly. The report was as follows:

"Report on the petition of John Stewart and John Davidson, referred on the 5th instant:

"It appears, in proof, that the said Stewart and Davidson, in the month of April last, imported at the port of Annapolis eighteen hundred bushels of salt, which was taken account of by the collector at the port aforesaid; and that, the night after the same was landed, an uncommon storm and flood raised the water at the port aforesaid, so that the cellar in which the salt was stored, though usually dry, was flowed with water to the depth of two feet, and thereby destroyed thirteen hundred and twenty-five bushels of the salt. The petitioners pray a remission of the duties on the last-mentioned quantity of salt.

"The committee are of opinion that the prayer of the petition be granted, and that a law pass for that purpose."

This record is to be found on page 69 of the manuscript reports of committees of the House of Representatives. A bill for the remission of the duties was accordingly passed by the House, and concurrently passed by the Senate, (which may be found in volume 2, Laws of the United States, page 174, chapter 64, approved August 4, 1790,) and is as follows:

"That so much of the duties accruing on eighteen hundred bushels of salt, imported, in the ship Mercury, into the port of Annapolis, in the State of Maryland, some time in the month of April last, on account of Messrs. John Stewart and John Davidson, as relates to thirteen hundred and twenty-five bushels thereof which were casually destroyed by flood, on the night of the same day on which the said salt was landed and stored, shall be, and the same is hereby, remitted."

Sir, the honorable gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. Johnson] says there is no precedent for a case like the one now before the House; but he has said this only because he could not have known of the existence of this case of Davidson. He knew not this, probably, from want of that critical examination which I have already said it is impossible for every gentleman of this House to give to every case that is presented to the House. But, says the gentleman, if there be precedent, it is only of a casual case, that passed without the observation of lawyers and a full knowledge of the facts. Sir, I admit that some precedents do find a place upon our statute books from oversight, and precedents that are wrong in principle, and that deserve not to weigh as authority. But, sir, the honorable gentleman will observe that this one now cited cannot have been and cannot now be considered as of this accidental and unworthy character; for the law itself embodies the fact that it is a remission of duties on salt "casually destroyed by flood on the night of the same day on which the said salt was landed and stored"—precisely the case now before the House.

Sir, what was just in 1790 is just at this day, if founded in principle.* The case of Davidson was allowed, not upon mere policy or expediency, in 1790, but upon principle; upon principle founded in equity as well as sound policy. It was allowed upon the same principle now recognised by the Committee of Ways and Means in the report of the case now before the House.

* On April 20, 1792, Alexander Hamilton, then Secretary of the Treasury, reported to the House on the petition of Eliphalet Ladd, which had been referred to his consideration by the House, in favor of remitting entirely the duties on goods which have been shipwrecked, and which escape either with or without damage, or to vest the power somewhere either to remit or abate, ac-

Congress conceded that the article destroyed was in its original state; that it had not gone into the market, nor entered into the consumption of the country; that its destruction would probably give place to a new importation of a corresponding amount, upon which the Government would get its duty; that it was destroyed without any lack of ordinary prudence and vigilance on the part of the importer; that the destruction could not have been covered by an ordinary insurance, and that all the facts were so proved as to negative the possibility of fraud in the case. Such is precisely the case now before the House; and upon what principle, I ask, can the one case be allowed, and the other disallowed?

The next kindred case of remission that is on record is the case of two French citizens, which reads as follows:

"An act for the remission of the duties on eleven hogsheds of coffee, which have been destroyed by fire.

"Whereas eleven hogsheds of coffee were imported in the brig Jason, from Cape Francois, by two French citizens, to the port of Norfolk and Portsmouth, in November last, and the duties thereon secured to be paid by Messieurs Elliot and Purviance, of the same port: And whereas the said eleven hogsheds of coffee were afterwards, on account of the same importers, shipped to the port of Baltimore, and there, in the night of the seventh day of January last, destroyed by fire:

"Be it therefore enacted, &c., That the duties paid or payable to the United States, on the same eleven hogsheds of coffee, be, and the same are hereby, remitted; and it shall be the duty of the collector of the port of Norfolk and Portsmouth to refund the same duties, if they have been received. Approved May 9th, 1794."

This act is found in the United States Laws, vol. 2, page 404. This case again covers a principle of much broader extent than the case of Dana & Co., and exhibits, comparatively, no merit, when contrasted with the latter. The claimants were foreigners; the goods had been imported to one market, and thence to a second market, and were, after this, destroyed by fire, by an exposure of the property to a new and ordinary risk, against which an insurance might have been effected, and against which ordinary prudence would have effected an insurance. Nevertheless, as they were destroyed according to the circumstances of the case. He added: "From the rareness of the casualty, this loss to the revenue, from either arrangement, could not be very material." See State Papers, volume 1, on Finance, page 162.

In the case of Paul Chase, praying a remission of duties on goods imported into St. Mary's, Georgia, during the last war, and subsequently captured by the enemy, the committee said: "The object of the Government in laying duties on foreign merchandise imported into the United States is to raise a revenue, for the support of Government, on foreign merchandise actually consumed within the United States." See House Reports, No. 27, Session 1824-'5.

So in the case of J. F. Ohl, where seventy-five boxes of sugar were imported into Philadelphia in November, 1826, and destroyed by fire on the 7th of December, 1827, (three months thereafter,) the committee say: "The committee consider the precedents in which relief has been given to be confined to cases where the goods have been burnt or destroyed in the form in which they were originally imported; and believing, as they do, that the spirit of the revenue laws requires the collection of duties only upon those goods which are consumed in the country, and that every loss of this kind must necessarily call for an additional and equivalent importation, upon which duties will be paid, have reported a bill," &c. See Report 170, vol. 3, 1827-'8.

N. and L. Dana.

before entering into the consumption of the country, the duties were refunded.

And here again I beg the attention of the honorable gentleman from Tennessee, and of the House generally, to the fact that this case of the French citizens is not one where the facts could have escaped the notice of Congress, while the law in its favor was on its passage. It is not a precedent that was established through the negligence of Congress. So well did Congress understand what the measure and the case was, and so careful were they in the recognition of the principle it involved, that the facts of the case were especially set forth in the preamble of the bill, as I have read it from the statute book.

Congress herein recognised the principle, that inasmuch as the property destroyed had not actually entered into the consumption of the country, and had not gone into the market, but was held "on account of the same importers"—in other words, had never changed hands and owners—it was but just, and honest, and politic, to refund the duties paid upon it, though it had been several months in the country.

Sir, I do not press the principle in this broad extent now. I do not say I would recognise it to such an extent now. I cite the case only to show how much broader is the principle upon which Congress has heretofore acted in the remission of duties, than in the one now involved by the case before us. Surely, sir, if the case of the French citizens be admissible in half its extent, the case of Messrs. Dana & Co., now before us, is beyond question.

The case of Jabez Rogers is another case founded on the same policy of the Government. It is entitled "An act for the remission of the duties on certain distilled spirits destroyed by fire." It was approved June 7, 1794, and reads as follows—(see United States Laws, vol. 2, page 485:)

"Whereas Jabez Rogers, junior, who had erected large works at Middlebury, in the State of Vermont, for distilling spirits from the produce of the country, has had the same twice destroyed by fire, with a quantity of spirits therein, on which by law duties had become payable to the United States:

"And whereas, considering the equity of the case, said duties ought to be remitted; therefore,

"Be it enacted, &c., That the duties payable to the United States on all such distilled spirits as shall be proved, to the satisfaction of the supervisor of the district of Vermont, to have been destroyed by fire in the distilleries lately burnt at Middlebury, in the State of Vermont, be and are hereby remitted."

Here, again, the principle adopted is altogether more broad and liberal than is asked or contemplated in the case of Dana & Co., now before the House. It not only adopts the principle of refunding the duties that had accrued to the Government, because the dutiable article was destroyed before entering into the ordinary consumption of the country, but, also, in a case where the loss incurred was from a risk against which ordinary prudence would have protected the owner; where an insurance of the property, against the very loss incurred, was possible. The case before the committee imbodyes all the merit of the first principle, without being exposed to the derogation of the last-mentioned circumstance.

The principle of refunding duties imposed by Government, in cases where the purpose of both the Government in imposing such duties, and of the individual in paying them, has been defeated by inevitable and unforeseen accident, which is precisely the principle of the case of the Danas, was fully recognised and adopted by Government in the act of June 1, 1796, entitled "An act providing relief to the owners of stills within the United States, for a limited time, in certain cases." That act provided (see 2d vol. United States Laws, p. 571) that where a distiller had been "really and truly prevented from employing or working his still or stills, during any part of the term for which he had rendered it liable to pay a duty upon its or their capacity, by the destruction or failure of fruit and grain, or any other unavoidable cause, within the district in which he resides," &c., he might pay upon its capacity a pro rata duty for the time his still or stills were actually employed.

The same principle was adopted by the act of March 3, 1797, relating to duties laid upon mills employed in the manufacture of snuff. The second section of that act provides as follows, (see 2d vol. United States Laws, p. 590:): "That in all cases of licenses granted under the said act, where, by failure of water or other casualty, occurring to the mill or mills, or to the implements, or to the proprietor or other person licensed, the use and benefit of such license has been lost, or considerably interrupted, and the duties thereon required, or paid, may be considered peculiarly unequal and injurious, the Secretary of the Treasury, upon due representation and proof of such case, shall be, and hereby is, authorized to cause to be refunded or remitted such part of duties paid or secured on such license as shall appear just and reasonable under the circumstances of the case, and having regard to the loss, injury, or peculiar hardship, sustained as aforesaid."

I may cite the case of the Providence merchants, found in vol. 3, p. 433, of the Laws of the United States. The collector of the district of Providence, in the State of Rhode Island, was authorized and directed, by the law of their case, to remit the duties on such parts of two certain cargoes of teas as were imported on the 29th of July, 1800, by Thomas Lloyd & Co., and on the 22d of August, 1800, by John J. Clark, "as remained deposited to secure the payment of duties, under the care of the officers of the customs, on the 21st day of January last, in the aforesaid town of Providence, and shall be proved, to the satisfaction of the said collector, to have been burned and destroyed."

This was approved March 3, 1801.

The committee who reported this last case for relief say:

"Your committee are of opinion that, as the goods were under the care of the officers of the customs at the time they were consumed by fire, and not subject to the control of the owners; and that, as granting relief in this case cannot establish a precedent dangerous to the revenue, the prayer of the petition ought to be granted." American State Papers, vol. 1, on Finance, p. 698.

Here the principle of not exacting duties on goods destroyed before entering into the ordinary consumption of the country is distinctly and undeniably recognised, and is the great leading principle of the case. Here, also, the principle of remission is extended far beyond the nature of the case presented by the Messrs. Danas & Co., because it is made to cover a loss arising from a risk against which an ordinary insurance and ordinary vigilance would have protected the owners. The fact that the property was still in possession of the Government does not alter the case, only so far as it may presume to shut out the possibility of fraud on the part of the importers, because this fact did not take the case out of the principle of ordinary insurances, nor release the owners from exercising ordinary vigilance to secure themselves against loss from such a risk.

Mr. Speaker, I might go on and cite, in detail, each of the several cases that have come before Congress for remission, but for consuming too much of the time of the House. Suffice it to say that, after careful and vigilant search, I find no case conflicting with the principle of the case now presented, and when the fact that the property destroyed was so situated as not to be insurable was taken into consideration. Cases may be found where there was a want of proof of vigilance and ordinary care, or where the property was insurable in the ordinary way, or where it has been exposed to new risks, against which the Government could not properly be made a partner with the importers or owners. Such cases have been, and very properly, too, rejected. The last case of this kind, I believe, which was acted on by Congress, was that of George and William Bangs, in January, 1830. It was a case of goods destroyed by fire. But, sir, on turning to the proceedings of the House upon this case, I find it to have been one clearly excluded by the principles of the report of the Committee of Ways and Means in the case before us. The case of Bangs* was one of neglect and want of ordinary care. The gentleman who is now the oldest Representative of Rhode Island upon this floor [Mr. FEARCE] was among the number who opposed the bill, and he opposed it on the ground that the argument urged in its support "would establish a bad precedent"—"would lead to the conclusion that Government would guaranty all goods imported, which, through neglect, might be destroyed in the store, or which might be exported by coastwise navigation from the North to the South." He denied that there was any analogy between this case and that of the goods destroyed by fire at Savannah, and upon which the duties were remitted.

The honorable chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means of the present House was also among the number who opposed the bill in favor of the Bangs. He did it expressly on the ground that "the effect of the passage of the bill would be to encourage the importing merchants to neglect their business. He attributed the fact of this claim being made to the remissness of the importer, who ought, as every merchant who knows his business does, to have insured his property. This was a case, he contended, of gross and palpable negligence; and if the House should adopt the principle of the bill, we would have our tables crowded with memorials whenever a fire takes place in the United States. The merchants in the interior of the country had as good right to claim a remission of duties on goods destroyed by fire as the importers."

Sir, I accord most fully with these views, and the principles upon which they are founded. But, sir, a broad, marked, and manifest principle distinguishes the case now before the House from the Bangs case, as thus represented. In a case not only deficient in proof of ordinary vigilance on the part of the importer, but thus marked by proof of "gross and palpable negligence," I should feel it my duty, as every other member of this body would feel it to be his duty, to reject the claim. Sir, the argument of such a case does not touch or affect the merits of the present one.

Thus much, Mr. Speaker, have I felt it my duty to say in relation to precedents. I will venture to affirm, that while numerous precedents of remission can be adduced, covering all of the principles of the present case, and stretching even far beyond it, not one case will be found rejected, wherein the facts set forth are not distinguishable in point of strength and merit from this case, and therefore not deserving of weight as authority against it, even with those gentlemen who wish to be governed by precedent.

But, sir, I appeal now to those naked principles of justice and policy, which this House and Congress ought and may safely adopt, as decisive of all cases. I ask not to have this Dana case regarded as an exception to all general principles of legislation, but as coming fairly and rightfully within those general principles which ought to be recognised in all legislation towards the mercantile community. These are the principles, laid down in this report of the Committee of Ways and Means. And let it be established that, in those cases, and in those cases only, will Congress remit duties on goods destroyed, where—

1st. The goods were, when destroyed, in their original state as imported, and had not entered into the mass of commodities destined for the immediate consumption of the country.

2d. Where the circumstances of the loss are such as not only to excite no suspicion of fraud, but as expressly and directly to exclude the possibility of it.

3d. Where the loss could not have been covered by ordinary insurance, or guarded against by the caution and diligence of a vigilant and prudent man of business; and where the evidence to all these points is full, direct, unquestionable, and of the highest nature the case will permit.

Sir, I ask the allowance of this Dana case only upon those principles, as a case justified in every requirement of those principles beyond any controversy or question. I can conceive of no danger or possible injustice to the Treasury of the Government by adopting these fundamental rules of remission. I can conceive of no sound argument that can be adduced on the opposite side, that will not do injustice to the commercial interests of the country. Surely Government cannot desire to pursue a policy that shall work injustice to the vigilant importing merchant, nor to speculate upon his inevitable misfortunes. If the merchant, under any case that can be conceived of as coming within the principles I have adverted to as the just ones to control this case, can stand up against the loss incurred, without any fault on his part, of the original cost and expenses of importation of the goods so destroyed, surely the Government may well abstain from exacting of him the payment of duties upon the property; and surely, moreover, the Government that is unwilling to relax its demands upon the unfortunate merchants in a case of such extreme hardship must be regarded as slow indeed in the encouragement of honest enterprise. I trust such is not the character of our Government. Be that as it may, I have discharged my duty towards the claimants in this, and every similar case.

After further debate, and before any question was taken upon the bill,

MONDAY, JANUARY 16.

ABOLITION OF SLAVERY.

The unfinished business of the morning hour was the petition presented on Monday last by Mr. ADAMS, from forty inhabitants of the town of Dover, in the county of Norfolk, in the State of Massachusetts, praying for the abolition of slavery and the slave trade in the District of Columbia; the pending question being on the motion of Mr. LAWLER that the petition be not received.

Mr. BYNUM was entitled to the floor.

Mr. HOWARD requested the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. BYNUM] to yield the floor, with a view to enable him (Mr. H.) to make another effort to give the States a chance of getting in their petitions. There were more than half the States in the Union that could not have the opportunity. He proposed to suspend the rule, to enable him to offer a resolution that the States be called for petitions in reverse order.

Mr. BYNUM said he would have great pleasure in yielding the floor for that purpose, if it should be understood that he would be entitled to the floor when this petition should next come up. He thought the House should suspend the rule, to enable the member from Maryland to submit his resolution.

Mr. ADAMS said he hoped the rule would not be suspended. He begged the House and the Speaker to recollect that this state of things—

Mr. W. B. SHEPARD rose to a question of order. A motion to suspend the rule he understood not to be debateable, and he hoped the Chair would enforce the rule.

The SPEAKER said the motion could not be debated.

Mr. ADAMS called for the yeas and nays on the motion to suspend the rule; which were ordered, and were: Yeas 123, nays 58.

So the rule was suspended.

Mr. HOWARD then offered the following resolution: Resolved, That in calling the States for petitions on this day, the Speaker do call in the reverse order, beginning with the youngest Territory.

Mr. ADAMS called for the yeas and nays on the adoption of the resolution; which the House refused to order.

And the question was then taken, and decided in the affirmative: Yeas 125, nays 33.

So the resolution was adopted.

Petitions and memorials were then called for in the reverse order of States and Territories.

Mr. E. WHITTLESEY said, it having been the sense of the House that petitions relating to the abolition of slavery should not be discussed to-day, he begged to state that he had several such in his possession, but that he refrained from offering them, under the hope that, when he did offer them, he might be heard for a few moments in relation to the direction which he thought should be given to them by the House.

MEMORIAL FROM DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

The SPEAKER presented a memorial from the grand jurors of the county of Washington, in the District of Columbia, soliciting that hereafter no petitions may be received or entertained by Congress, from societies or inhabitants of the non-slaveholding States, for the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia.

Mr. PINCKNEY moved to lay the memorial on the table.

Mr. WASHINGTON called for the reading; and it was read accordingly.

Mr. GRAHAM called for the yeas and nays on the motion of Mr. PINCKNEY; but the House refused to order them.

And the question was then taken, and decided in the affirmative.

So the memorial was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. JENIFER moved that the same be printed.

The SPEAKER said the motion was not now in order.

Mr. HESTER presented the petition of 240 females of his congressional district, praying for the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia, and moved that the same be referred to the Committee on the said District.

Mr. W. B. SHEPARD objected to its reception. Mr. S. said that, whenever a proper opportunity presented itself, it was his intention to offer a few remarks on this subject. He did not feel disposed now to violate the agreement which had been made with his colleague, [Mr. BRUNDY] that this discussion should lie over; and he moved, therefore, that the further consideration of the petition be postponed until Monday next.

Mr. DAVIS moved to lay the preliminary motion of reception on the table.

Mr. STORER inquired if the effect of the motion to lay on the table, should it prevail, would not be to reject the petition for the time being.

The SPEAKER said the effect of the motion would be to suspend all action, and to leave the petition exactly where it was.

And the question was taken, and decided in the affirmative: Yeas 89, nays 37.

So the preliminary question was laid on the table.

PROTECTION TO COMMERCE.

Mr. LAWRENCE presented the memorial of George Hallett, and four hundred merchants of the city of Boston, praying Congress to establish steam and other vessels for the protection of the navigation of ships of the United States coming on our coast in the winter.

Mr. L. adverted briefly to the fearful loss of life and property which had taken place on our coast during the last year, to an extent unprecedented in our history.

This loss was to be attributed in part to the want of a good system of pilotage, but mainly to the fact that vessels coming, after very long voyages, on a bleak and wintry coast, and short of provisions, required some protection and assistance which their own crews were not able to render. He moved that the petition be referred to the Committee on Commerce, and expressed a hope that some action would be speedily had upon the subject.

The petition was referred accordingly.

During the day, a number of petitions, praying for the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia, were presented; which were, in every instance, met by the motion to lay the preliminary motion of reception on the table, and which motion prevailed.

After the reception and disposal of several resolutions of inquiry,

TUESDAY, JANUARY 17.

KEEPING THE JOURNALS.

Mr. UNDERWOOD asked the consent of the House to submit a resolution, which he desired might be read for the information of the House.

Mr. JARVIS objected to the reception of the resolution and to its reading.

Mr. UNDERWOOD said, if the Clerk would return the resolution, he (Mr. U.) would state briefly its substance to the House.

Mr. ADAMS said, if the gentleman from Kentucky was permitted to read the resolution, he (Mr. A.) hoped no more objection would be made to members reading papers in their places.

The SPEAKER said the question could not be debated.

Mr. UNDERWOOD inquired if it was in order to make a brief statement of the contents of the resolution.

The SPEAKER said it was in order so to do, but it was not in order to read the resolution itself.

Mr. UNDERWOOD said his object was to submit a series of resolutions, declaring the sense of this House that it was not competent, under the constitution of the United States, to change, alter, expunge, mutilate, or destroy, the journals of either House of Congress; that the preservation of the journals of either House of Congress was a subject of national importance, and a fit subject of national legislation; that, after these journals had been faithfully kept and preserved—

Mr. CUSHMAN called the gentleman from Kentucky to order.

Mr. UNDERWOOD declared that he had not yet completed the brief statement of the contents of the resolution, though he had nearly done so.

The CHAIR said he must request the gentleman from Kentucky to submit his motion to the House.

H. OF R.]

Public Lands—Executive Administration.

[JAN. 17, 1837.]

Mr. UNDERWOOD said his motion was to suspend the rule to enable him to offer this resolution. Could he not read what was the purport of that resolution?

The CHAIR said he thought not, the reading of the resolution having been specially objected to. A member could not himself read what the Clerk was not permitted to read.

After a few further remarks on the point of order, Mr. JARVIS, with a view to save the time of the House, withdrew his objection to the reading of the resolution. The same was accordingly read, and is as follows:

Resolved by the House of Representatives, That the 3d clause of the 5th section of the 1st article of the constitution, in the following words, to wit: "Each House shall keep a journal of its proceedings; and, from time to time, publish the same, excepting such parts as may, in their judgment, require secrecy; and the yeas and nays of the members of either House on any question shall, at the desire of one fifth of those present, be entered on the journal," confers no power whatever on either House of Congress, at a subsequent session, to change, alter, deface, expunge, or destroy, its journal, or any part thereof, when the same has been regularly and faithfully kept during a previous session, and duly published.

Resolved, further, That the journals of both Houses of Congress, kept and published as aforesaid, after the adjournment sine die, become national archives; and that all attempts and acts of either House separately, or of both by joint resolution, to change, alter, deface, expunge, or destroy, either journal, or any part thereof, are violations of the constitution.

Resolved, That the preservation of the national archives from mutilation, disfiguration, and destruction, is a fit subject of legislation. Wherefore,

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be directed to report a bill providing for the deposit of the original journals of each House, after their adjournment sine die, in the office of the Secretary of State; and for the punishment of every and all persons, their aiders and abettors, who shall alter, change, deface, expunge, or destroy, any part of either journal after such adjournment.

Mr. MORGAN called for the yeas and nays on the motion to suspend; which were ordered, and were: Yeas 77, nays 118.

So the rule was not suspended.

THE PUBLIC LANDS.

The unfinished business of the morning hour was the resolution of Mr. C. ALLAN, providing that certain grants of the public domain be made to such States as have not yet received them, together with the several amendments thereto proposed.

The pending question was on the motion heretofore submitted by Mr. BORN, to lay the resolution and amendments on the table.

On which motion the yeas and nays had been heretofore ordered; and having been now taken, were: Yeas 114, nays 82.

So the resolution and amendments were laid on the table.

EXECUTIVE ADMINISTRATION.

The House proceeded to the consideration of the following resolution, heretofore offered by Mr. WISE:

"Resolved, That so much of the President's message as relates to the 'condition of the various executive departments, the ability and integrity with which they have been conducted, the vigilant and faithful discharge of the public business in all of them, and the causes of complaint, from any quarter, at the manner in which they have fulfilled the objects of their creation,' be referred to a select committee, to consist of nine members, with power to send for persons and papers, and with instructions to inquire into the condition of the various executive departments, the ability and integrity with which they have been conducted, into the manner in which the public business has been discharged in all of them, and into all causes of complaint, from any quarter, at the manner in which said departments, or their bureaus or offices, or any of their officers or agents, of every description whatever, directly or indirectly connected with them in any manner, officially or unofficially, in duties pertaining to the public interest, have fulfilled or failed to accomplish the objects of their creation, or have violated their duties, or have injured and impaired the public service and interest; and that said committee, in its inquiries, may refer to such periods of time as to them may seem expedient and proper."

To which resolution Mr. D. J. PEARCE had offered an amendment, for which Mr. FRENCH had offered a substitute.

Mr. McKEON said the reading of the resolution must bring to the attention of the House the fact that a large portion of its time had been expended upon the discussion of the various topics which had been introduced into the debate. He was deeply impressed with the necessity of confining any remarks he might offer within a narrow compass. He assured the House that nothing would have induced him to prolong a debate already too much extended, except that justice to those with whom he acted, and to himself, required him to notice some of the observations made in the course of the debate.

When the resolution of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WISE] was introduced, I viewed it (said Mr. McK.) as a measure novel in its character, and one calculated to establish a precedent which might hereafter be perverted. In the phraseology of the resolution I saw a power of unlimited extent intrusted to a committee of this House. I am not of that school which insists upon a search warrant to authorize you to examine your public offices, but I cannot but believe that, if you intend to examine any matter beyond the manner in which your public agents discharge the duties of their appointment, you will require something more than a resolution of this House. What does the original resolution propose? To examine into the official and unofficial conduct of those who are directly or indirectly connected with the public departments. This is the task which is to be allotted to a committee of this House. This is the inquisitorial tribunal you propose to create. If we appoint the committee, how can it proceed in the discharge of its duty? The power of this House can go no further than to examine into the official conduct of those who are in office, who receive their compensation at your hands, and who are liable to censure and removal for any breach of duty. In every point connected with your public offices, in every matter of an official character; you have the right and the power to exact a rigid, strict examination; but when you will attempt to inquire into the unofficial conduct of a public officer, or to make the widespread investigation proposed by the resolution, the success of your investigation will depend more upon the disposition of those who may be called before the committee than on any power of this House to compel them to satisfy your inquiries. You will search in vain for a precedent for this movement in parliamentary history; but you may find one elsewhere. There can be found one direction to which it bears a strict resemblance. The command of this House to the committee may be found in that of Dogberry to the watch, a sweeping resolution to "comprehend all vagrom men," and to let all go who will not stand according to order. Let it be considered that we have several standing committees, whose duty it is to investigate the affairs of your departments. Let it be considered, also, that, but a few days since, we appointed a committee, at the head of which is the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. GARLAND,] which committee is daily engaged in the examination of one of the subjects referred to in this resolution. Yes, sir, the very point which, I believe, according to the mover of this proposition, gave rise to this proposed investigation. But in addition to these means which are within our power, the amendment of the gentleman from Rhode Island is offered. That amendment is, in my opinion, not open to the objections which may be made to the original proposition. It is in accordance with parliamentary practice. It is no part of the duty of a Legislature to undertake an exploring expedition in search of abuses; but if abuses are charged, it becomes a solemn duty to investigate them. The amendment proposes to create a tribunal before which charges can be made, and to examine into the truth of those charges. Suppose a petition was presented to this House, and referred to one of the appropriate committees, praying an examination into the manner in which your public officers discharge their duties, and setting forth that abuses existed. Your committee would ask the petitioners for specific charges, and if they were produced the examination would be made. I doubt very much whether they would inquire of your different departments and bureaus for something to sustain the allegation of the petitioners.

But, sir, it appears that your standing committees, your select committee, the amendment, will not be satisfactory. Nothing will give sufficient latitude but the original resolution. I prefer sustaining the amendment, believing it cannot be perverted hereafter into a dangerous precedent; but if that cannot be adopted, I shall not be found denying investigation. I am willing to give every facility, and to afford ample means, to pursue the desired examination; to have the official transactions and correspondence of your public offices laid open. As the representatives of the people, we are bound to guard every department. We are bound to pour light into every portion of this Government. It is due not only to the country, but to the incumbents, to those on this floor who wish the examination, that some decision should be had on this subject, and that without delay. The debate which has arisen upon this resolution has resuscitated the denunciations and charges which we had reason to believe were long since buried. I have been surprised to observe the course of the present discussion. The same accusations of corruption, of proscription, and of abuses of every nature, which were made at the last session, with a view of operating on the then approaching political contest, are reiterated upon the present occasion. We ought to suspect that our fate has been that of Rip Van Winkle; that we have been sleeping quietly while the thunders of the opposition, louder far than any which reverberated through the Catskill, have been pealing over us, and we have been unconscious of the presidential contest which has just closed. If there is to be a repetition of those charges, it is full time we should be aroused. I have sought for new statements, but none are offered. Let it be remembered that the same representations which are made now were made before the struggle commenced; that the same evidence, sustained by the aid of the same distinguished gentlemen, was laid before the people of this country, and that the people supported him against whom these charges were intended to operate. Why do gentlemen stop even now? Why do they halt? Why not cross the Rubicon? There is still remedy left. If outrages upon the constitution, if violations of the liberties of the people, have been committed, why, instead of making the accusation, is not the individual who is the author of these evils made liable to the consequences of impeachment? If he has violated the rights of any of your citizens, any of the rights of any branch of the Government, why is he not placed in a situation where he will be required to defend his public character from these accusations? If we have watchful sentinels on the ramparts of constitutional liberty, let them not only sound the alarm, but let them seize upon him whom they represent to be an enemy of the country. That country has a right to demand this movement at the hands of those who are so desirous of preserving its interests from violation. Nothing is easier than to denounce. We ask for the evidences to support the charges they make—we ask for action. The Executive has been represented as a violator of his plighted faith, as one who had broken every pledge. Let us look to his inaugural address, which ought to be considered as an exposition of the policy which would characterize his administration. In regard to your foreign policy, he had stated that he would endeavor to preserve peace and cultivate friendship with all nations on honorable terms, and to adjust our differences in the forbearing spirit becoming a powerful nation, rather than the sensibility belonging to a gallant people. Has this been fulfilled? Do you find the violation of this pledge in the elevated position which our country sustains amongst the nations of the earth? He pledged himself to a spirit of compromise, equity, and caution, in regard to your tariff, by the promotion of agriculture, commerce, and manufactures; and if any encouragement should be given, it was only to those articles which might be found essential to our national independence. Let his messages to Congress show how far he has labored to discharge this pledge. He avowed his determination to reform abuses, by depending for the promotion of the public service not on the number, but on the efficiency, the integrity, the zeal, of public officers. Let the consequences of the toils of those agents, visible in the negotiation of foreign treaties, and in the happy results of the faithful discharge of duties within our country, be his defence on this point. He promised to facilitate the extinguishment of the public debt. Has that been discharged? Does not the contest here for the division of an immense surplus in your Treasury speak for him on this subject? Has not, during this administration, the novel spectacle been presented to the world of an immense republic, unshackled with a national debt? When the violence of political feeling shall have subsided, but one opinion, sir, will be given of the present administration; and if, as some gentlemen insist, the coming administration will be but a continuation of the policy of the present, the country may be congratulated on the prospect of a career of brilliancy and prosperity. It will be a continuation of a policy which seeks to enlarge the liberties of every citizen, and to promote the welfare of the Union.

The corruption which exists in the Government is a fruitful theme. The dictation of the Executive, and his interference with the elective franchise, have been blazoned forth to the world. Sir, if we have had a dictator, he bears but little resemblance to the Sylla of other days. The Roman retired when the aristocracy had been armed with the sceptre, but our dictator is about to surrender his trust when the democracy is triumphant. Do gentlemen suppose that the intelligence of this country is to be deceived with this outcry? May we ask when and where this dictation took place? Who were the individuals who yielded, or the States that submitted to his commands? We hear of Tennessee! That State did not vote for the individual who is said to have obtained his election by the dictation of the Executive. If the dictation of the President was of any avail, it must have been united not only with omnipotence but omnipresence. Its results are seen in Maine, and at the same time in Louisiana—in the Atlantic States and in your far West. This charge (let gentlemen consider) of dictation and of corruption, reaches not only the Executive, but at those above that Executive. The poisoned arrows which are scattered strike not only those against whom they are aimed, but at the body of the American people. If there are corrupters, where are the corrupted? Are we to seek for them amongst the honest yeomanry of the land? Is this degrading character to be given to our countrymen? I trust we are not ready to look upon a majority of our fellow-citizens as obedient slaves, obeying the edicts of an imperial master. The sin of the Executive has been that he moved in unison with the people, and for this he is denounced. This is his crime, in the eyes of his opponents. I cannot believe that his course will at any time be deemed unpatriotic, or prejudicial to the institutions of our common country.

The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. ROBERTSON] objected most strenuously to the proscription which had been carried out during the present administration. The opposition is distinguished, if we are to believe what we hear, by magnanimity, by generosity, by respect for freedom of opinion. Cases have been adduced to show the oppression heaped upon some of our fellow-citizens. I could not but observe the indignation excited amongst some of the opponents of the administration at the recital of instances of removals from office. I cannot speak of the merits of these cases; I am ignorant of them. I cannot, however, but look upon the denunciations which have been made against removals from office as an evidence of a policy which has not heretofore distinguished our opponents. I suppose that hereafter, in no part of the country where they hold the power, no man is to be removed who entertains opinions in accordance with those of the democracy. The guillotine which I have seen ready to do its office in one city of this Union is to be removed—the victims are to be released. I have, I confess candidly, Mr. Speaker, some misgivings. Judging from the past, I can have but little hope for the future. "To know the right, and yet the wrong pursue," seems to be the fate of our opponents.

Look at the city of New York, where the opposition, during the celebrated panic session, obtained power. The process of removal was fully carried out. The lamps in our streets were not allowed to be lighted by those who were democrats. Look to Philadelphia; one sweeping proscription, if rumor speaks truly. Look to Pennsylvania, when the Government of the State was changed. The offices given to those who had placed the present incumbents in power, and those who thought with the general administration proscribed, and their families; depending for subsistence on the emoluments of their humble offices, turned adrift upon the world. Sir, this proscription which they denounce they practice. Let not the charge be made against us until, by their example, they can enforce their advice with more authority than they can at present. Let not their indignation be excited against the administration, or their sympathy expressed in favor of its supposed victims, so long as they have on every side an opportunity of bestowing their sympathy on those who have suffered by the exercise of the power they hold. The administration cannot be justly liable to this accusation. Here and elsewhere it has been confidently asserted, by those who have examined this subject, that a large majority of those holding offices are opposed to the administration; and the sweeping proscription and persecution for expression of opinion cannot with propriety be charged against it.

We have heard much of the war on the currency which has been waged by the present administration. The disturbance of our financial operations, the chaos of our commercial affairs, have been placed to the account of the Executive. The party in power for the past seven years has been carrying on, if any, a war on the United States Bank; and if that be a war on the currency, they must plead guilty. It has been a contest in which we have seen the concentrated wealth of the nation in arms against the Government and the people; and we have seen that contest concluded with the triumph of the people over an institution which had threatened to poison the very fountains of your prosperity. We have carried on a war against a system which carries within the most alarming elements. You have seen institutions invested with a power of creating a "paper currency," starting into existence in every section. You have seen a power placed in the hands of a particular class of men to control the fortunes of their fellow-citizens. You have seen prices rising, values disturbed, an unsettled and feverish state of public feeling. You have seen the swollen tide of speculation rushing from one end of the country to the other, bearing upon it every individual. Purchases made, not with a view to the natural operations of trade, but regulated alone by the credits which might be obtained. You have seen the favorable gale, swelling every man's sails; but now the tempest is seen, driving before it thousands, whose fate it will be difficult to predict. You have seen in this country, and on the other side of the Atlantic, gathering signs in the commercial horizon; anxiety, intense anxiety, pervading every section of the country. When the cause of the excitement is examined, when it is asserted that the over-issues have been the main cause of the present state of things, when we are told to look back to the troubles in England in past years, and observe that the same state of things was produced by similar causes; yet when the effort is made by the Government to check this evil, by calling into circulation the constitutional currency of the country, with a view to give security to your financial operations, to give stability to the value of property, and to afford labor its just reward, it is denounced as tyrannical and oppressive. The question of currency, I am willing to admit, is intricate; but I do not believe it too intricate to be beyond the understanding of an acute and intelligent people—of a people whose pursuits render it necessary for them to watch every movement in the industry and finance of the country. They desire a sound currency, but not a currency which is given to them by holding their liberties at the will of any body of men.

I cannot omit a reference to the allusions which have been made to the President during this debate. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WISE] has traced his course from the period of his early obscurity to the present exalted station which he now holds. From its rise in humbleness, he has found the tenor of his life a broad and sweeping current, rolling onward under the living light of day and the steady gaze of the nation. Parallels are sought; but where? Are they sought for amongst the patriots whose reputations are interwoven with the brightest epochs of the past? Are they found in some brilliant example of devotion to country, of fidelity to her institutions, of purity of purpose, of undying patriotism; amongst the Aristides, the Curtii, or the Catos? No, sir; we find them seeking for parallels in the most corrupt and degraded periods of the Roman Government. They find them in a Commodus or a Severus; in the vile, the profligate, and depraved emperors of a crumbling empire. Who is your modern Commodus? Shall I summon from his many battle fields the manes of the dead to be his defenders? No, sir; let the living attest his worth! Let them answer whether or not it was by collecting around him the abandoned Cleanders of his time he led your country through many difficulties up to the eminence on which he now is having her! Even in the highest excitement of a political contest, we ought not to forget the services of our public men—of those who "have done the state some service." The petty differences of party will disappear, but the results of the labor of those men never will be destroyed. For one, I will not desecrate the temple of our Union by any attempt to deface one particle of those brilliant names that may cast their splendor over it. Fidelity to our own principles never can be incompatible with justice and toleration for those of our opponents. I speak of this point not as a partisan, but as an American. I cannot be deterred, by the fear of being termed a flatterer, from doing justice to any man. I ask gentlemen how they can hope that the people will attend to their charges? We are told it is to inform the people of the dangers they have passed—of the conspiracies against their liberties that have been exploded. Why, sir, Cicero himself would not have been heeded when the conspirators were deprived of all power to injure. The people of this country will not, as the hour is approaching which is to separate them from him who has for years enjoyed their highest confidence, stand with ready ear to listen to denunciations. Not while one spark of gratitude remains will they refuse to shield him. They will be seen protecting him from the flames of political persecutions; they will be the first to rescue him—the patriot who has led their armies to victory and given permanency to their Union—from the ignominy of being placed in the same niche of immortal infamy with a Commodus or a Severus.

There is one aspect in which the present discussion will be viewed with interest by the country. It is the objections which have been raised against the coming administration. We are told that the people have no pledge of any line of policy; that the President elect is untrammelled by any promises. He can sustain a tariff or an anti-tariff policy; he may be for internal improvements by the General Government, or against them; he may be for a national bank, or against it; for distribution, or against distribution—that upon leading political questions he is in no manner committed. What, sir! no policy promised? If there is any point on which the President elect is not committed, the fault lies not with him. Not far from me is the member from Kentucky, [Mr. WILLIAMS,] who submitted questions of the highest importance to the country before the election. The reply to those queries is part of your political history. That reply formed the chief point of attack in your presidential contests. On most of the points which agitated the country, the people of this country have had an ample exposition of the views of the individual who has been elevated by their suffrages to the first office within their power. You have, in the document to which I refer, his opinions with regard to the Bank of the United States. You have his views on the great and absorbing subject of your public revenues, and the policy of distribution. When he speaks of this measure, it is but in accordance, so far as results are concerned, with the opinions of a distinguished statesman, whose course is sustained by a large portion of the opponents of the administration, and whose sentiments are given in a speech, delivered some years since, in the Senate of the United States. The Clerk of the House will read the passage in that speech to which I refer.

Speaking of the public debt, he remarked: "It is so near being totally extinguished that we may now safely inquire whether, without prejudice to any established policy, we may not relieve the consumption of the country by the repeal or reduction of duties, and curtail, considerably, the public revenue. In making this inquiry, the first question which presents itself is, whether it is expedient to preserve the existing duties, in order to accumulate a surplus in the Treasury for the purpose of subsequent distribution among the several States. I think not. If the collection for the purpose of such a surplus is to be made from the pockets of one portion of the people, to be ultimately returned to the same pockets, the process would be attended with the certain loss arising from the charges of collection, and with the loss also of interest, while the money is performing the unnecessary circuit;—and it would therefore be unwise. If it is to be collected from one portion of the people, and given to another, it would be unjust. If it is to be given to the States in their corporate capacity, to be used by them in their public expenditures, I know of no principle in the constitution which authorizes the Federal Government to become such a collector for the States, nor of any principle of safety or propriety which admits of the States becoming such recipients of gratuity from the General Government.

"The public revenue, then, should be regulated and adapted to the proper service of the General Government."

These views were presented by one of the Senators from Kentucky, [Mr. CLAY.] These views were sustained by the minority which were found on the deposit bill of the last session; and it could not be objected to by that minority, that from those with whom they differed in sentiment they could obtain support for the course which they pursued. It is the pledge that we shall have aid in relieving the people from burdens of a grievous character, and a pledge which we have a right to insist on being fulfilled.

But, sir, his opponents were not satisfied with the course which the President elect had pursued before the nation in a long life of political action; they were not satisfied with his open and avowed declarations, but in every section of the country he was represented to entertain different views, but always those which might be particularly unpopular. I will not attempt to follow the whole train, but I cannot forego the opportunity of referring to one of the means called into action against him. I allude to the fact of dragging his opinions on religious matters into the political contest. His opponents, aware of the prejudice existing against one creed in this country, eagerly seized upon it to operate with effect upon some portion of our citizens. We are told that the votes of States were given against him on this reason. The spirit of intolerance—that spirit which has at all times, and in all countries, left the evidences of its triumphs in the blasted happiness and withered prosperity of thousands, was brought into the contest. In vain was the avowal of my colleague [Mr. VANDERPOOL] in favor of the candidate, showing that he did not entertain certain opinions. It was insisted, that even if he did not entertain them, yet he had been guilty, at least, of an act which, in England, would have rendered him liable to the pains and penalties of a præsumptio. But even in England, under an enlightened and liberal legislation, that badge of barbarity had been destroyed, and in this country never had existed. Punishment was due for the transgression, and the guilty must be reached through the ballot-box. Sir, no language can express the deep humiliation with which I refer to this topic; I feel that in a land of freedom—that land which gave to the cause of civil and religious liberty a Carroll, and contains the ashes of him whose pride was not alone to have been the author of the Declaration of Independence, but of the code to secure freedom of conscience—that there is a spirit which would drive a portion of our fellow citizens from the advantages of the Government, and place them as outcasts without the pale of your constitution. If this is to be the consequence of entertaining certain opinions, your constitution will be a mockery, your pledge of equality of rights is violated. Are they who have unloosed this whirlwind blind to the ravages it has elsewhere committed? Are they desirous of substituting the war of fanaticism for the peace and charity which exist at present through the country? Let them consider that the persecution which follows and crushes one sect to-day may turn upon another to-morrow. Let them not hope to be able "to check the fiery steeds they have driven to the edge of the precipice," and to save themselves from dashing down into the abyss where myriads lie entombed the victims of a similar spirit! Is this the age in which such scenes are to be enacted? No, sir; extinguish the lights of civilization and intelligence, before you illumine the torch of fanaticism. Its lurid glare will be lost in the blaze of freedom. Bring back the days of the Vandal and the Goth. Let then the ministers of savage orgies shout with joy around the tombs of the dead they have violated, and with frantic exultation amid the blazing ruins of seminaries of learning; at such a time, let the demon of persecution be unchained, and rush from one end of the country to the other. But if we desire peace, if we seek for the exercise of feelings of charity, we must not violate the spirit of that constitution which secures protection to all. The persecution of the ballot-box is but the precursor of penal legislation. We must not permit the ballot-box to be converted into an engine of oppression upon any portion of our countrymen. Let it be remembered that amongst those who are denounced are those whose integrity and devotion to the country are not to be questioned; that they are your fellow-citizens, who ask for nothing more than their constitutional rights, and ought not, will not, submit to less. I cannot be mistaken in my countrymen, or our institutions, when I say that in the intelligence and the liberality which should ever distinguish Americans, there is a guarantee for liberty of conscience which can never be destroyed; and that American liberty consists in freedom of opinion, freedom of industry, freedom of conscience.

We have been told that the approaching administration will be brought into power by the vilest means; that it is the triumph of the New York system. I find that it is the fashion of the hour to refer to that State. Her immense resources, her natural and artificial advantages, are paraded to excite a jealousy against her interests and her sons. Is this the spirit in which this Union was framed, or can be maintained? Why, to secure a petty triumph of party, is this effort made to array section against section, State against State? In sorrow, not in anger, have I heard the charges made against that State. I have witnessed the efforts to injure her fair fame; but still I look upon my native State with pride. Not one particle of her reputation is yet tarnished. That State can look back upon the past with high satisfaction, and look forward to the future with the brightest anticipations. What, sir, has been her system? She has had "a giant's strength, but she has used it like a giant." She stands erect in the consciousness of her sacrifices to the independence, the liberty of the country, and to the Union of these States. She presents to you her Saratoga, as her evidence of her devotion to the cause of the Revolution. Every point of her whole frontier is the theatre of resistance to the invasion of a savage or a civilized foe. In peace, as in war, no sordid policy has characterized her course. I challenge gentlemen to point out in the votes of her Representatives here, or in the legislation of the State, any disposition to elevate that State at the sacrifice of the rights or interests of any section of this confederacy. Her history contains not a single line for which one of her sons need blush. Proud of her history, proud of her enterprise, for one, I would, in the language of one who has given glory, not only to that State, but to the whole confederacy, as soon forget the mother that gave me birth, as that State the trophies of whose system may be seen in the unrivalled prosperity of her millions of inhabitants. The power she wielded was never exercised for oppression. Mighty she has been, but none has been more meek. To be the equal, not the superior, of her sister States, has ever been her object. Gratitude demands

This debate, sir, is the announcement of a course of policy which the country ought fully to understand. What is the development that we have seen made? That opposition is at once to be formed to the coming administration. We are told that a war is to be waged, a war of extermination, against him who has been placed in power by the sacrifice of the principles of liberty. A war against the man is to be declared. Why not avow at once a struggle, a "war to the knife," with the democracy? Where is the evidence of the violation of any rights by the successful candidate? Where the proof that, in his triumphant march to the Capitol, he has driven his chariot with savage exultation over the mangled corpse of your constitution? If opposition is at once to be arrayed, let the country know it. I cannot believe that he who sustains the coming administration must necessarily be a "traitor to the interests of the South," as we heard in this discussion. I will not admit that the South, which has but within a few short weeks past given evidence of its confidence, is at once to be marshalled in opposition, and that this position is to be assumed—that no matter with what purity, no matter with what patriotism, no matter with what success, the policy of the coming administration may be distinguished, still it must be paralyzed, still it must be crushed, must be annihilated. This I will not admit. The people will afford to their Chief Magistrate the same lenity and the same rule they would apply to the humblest servant in the public service. They will judge of him by his acts. It will be in vain to denounce the manner in which he was elected—none could be more honorable. In vain will they denounce the success of the man—they will discover that the struggle which has closed was not concluded by the triumph of any man. Let me assure gentlemen it is not the triumph of the candidate which causes the exultation which they observe on every side. It is the triumph of the true principles of your Government of the Union; it is the triumph of the people. We have been told that the people have been routed by the praetorian cohorts. No, sir; gentlemen mistake the scattered and retreating bands. The people are not seen flying in every direction. The people are not vanquished, but victorious, proudly victorious. They are victors over combinations unheard of in the annals of political warfare; victors over misrepresentation; victors over prejudice; victors over principles of every nature. "The flag of the country is still flying." Sir, I repeat the language of the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. Wise:] the flag of the country is still flying. We differ, sir, as to the character of that ensign. It is not the drapeau blanc; not the flag with a single star emblazoned on its folds; not the flag which was seen flying on one portion of your coast, the signal for the advance of a hostile fleet, but the flag which floated in triumph over Jefferson; which was seen amidst the blaze of an enemy's cannon in the days of Madison; that flag around which have always rallied the untiried friends of liberty; that banner is still flying; never, I trust, never to be struck down. And who, sir, are the praetorian bands who are rushing to the rescue? Look, sir, to the majority of this House; to a majority of the other branch of your Legislature; a majority of the people of this country. You may see them rushing from the granite hills of the East; you will find them pouring down in hordes from the North. They are to be found in the boundless and fertile prairies of the West, and may be seen gathering from the chivalrous South, even from the Old Dominion. On every side the yeomanry of the land have been eager to rally under this labarum. And yet these are the marauders, the trainbands, the obedient janizaries, the praetorian cohorts, who are
